Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The only trouble with the Senator's reference there is that while the money has apparently been spent, the source from which the funds are to come is what is worrying us. If we knew that it was going to be put on some shoulders other than our own, we could feel somewhat encouraged over what the Senator has been reading.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, the question of liberty is involved. I do not believe it is the duty of the Government, or ever should be the duty of the Government, to go out and say to a man how many acres he shall plant, or how he shall plant them, or how many cattle he shall breed, or how many sows shall be farrowed. I do not believe the Government ought to be in that kind of business at all. It is destructive of the very things for which we have stood, as was shown so ably by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] in his speech on liberty.

Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a short reference to Aesop's Fables, returning to a time 2,450 years ago, with reference to the wolf which said that if living in civilization meant that he would have to suffer having the hair worn from his neck by a collar that restricted his liberty, he would go back into the wilderness and fight for his living. I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD there be inserted this fable.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There was once a well-fed town dog who slipped his leash and rambled out into the country. On the edge of the forest he met a gaunt and feeble wolf who was starving to death. The dog was contemptuous. "This is all your own fault," said he. "It all comes of your irregular and ill-planned life. Why don't you get yourself steady employment as a watchdog, where food would be given you every day and you'd never have to worry about a living?" "Yes; why don't I?" said the wolf meekly. "I'm so nearly gone that if I knew where to get such employment I believe I'd take it."

"If you really mean that," said the dog, "just follow me back to town and I'll see that you get a place." So off they trotted together toward town. But on the way the wolf looked his friend over and asked him how it happened that the hair was all worn away from his neck. The dog explained that it was collar worn—that he was tied up most of the time and that the chafing came from straining at the leash. "But, of course, that's nothing compared with the ease I enjoy."

"Oh, isn't it?" said the wolf, as he turned in his tracks and trotted briskly back into the forest. According to Aesop, the moral to this story is: "Better to starve in freedom than be a fat slave."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I also ask that an editorial from the Red Oak Express, entitled "Give Thought to the Future of Your Liberties", be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Red Oak (Iowa) Express]

GIVE THOUGHT TO THE FUTURE OF YOUR LIBERTIES

The President's message clearly revealed that he has in mind plans which would completely revolutionize our social, economic, and governmental precedents. The President views the need as a "tremendous readjustment of our national life", and he promises a "permanent change in our social and economic arrangements."

The program of the new deal was sprung as an emergency measure and was so accepted by the public, which placed its faith and trust in the one man Franklin Roosevelt. Under the stress of conditions the public signed away some rights and surrendered personal licenses for what was believed to be for a period of temporary adjustments.

Now the vision of the President engulfs permanent and radical changes in our economic system—a program so drastic that it would make the people subservient to the State rather than the State subservient to the people. The objective is Government ownership, Government control, Government jobs, Government spending, greater Government taxes. This is the direction in which we have been rapidly drifting under the leadership of a President whose idealism and love of fellowmen prompts him to strive for the utopia of prosperity and happiness for his countrymen.

The sincerity of his conception, we do not question. The world has progressed on the ideals of great leaders. Woodrow Wilson gave his life for an ideal. Fundamentally he was right, but his idealism was too far advanced for the age in which he lived. The powers that Congress have given the President were emergency powers, and they were entrusted to him because the public did and does have faith in his integrity and confidence in his purpose. But Mr. Roosevelt will not always be President. In his place others will follow. Will they hold the confidence of the public and will they be true to their trusts? Peering into the future, there is grave danger in tampering with constitutional changes, sloughing off democratic principles, relinquishing individual rights and centralizing authority in Government during a period of national distress when it is difficult to get a proper and unbiased perspective.

Freedom, individuality, and initiative are counterparts of happiness. These characteristics have been ground into our souls since the landing of the Pilgrims. We fought for these forces in 1775, and we have cherished them since. In a moment of dreamy idealism and depression loyalty we should not toss overboard that which man has struggled to get and maintain through centuries of slow progress.

We must admit that a democracy has its failings. It progresses through trial and error, but in the long run the rule of the people is better for the rank and file than the people under rule. Autocracy springs from dictatorships and dictators arise when the people once lose their initiative and individuality in governing themselves.

We do not impugn the motives of the President. He is actuated by the desire to serve his people and surround them with comforts and happiness. His sincerity is beyond question. But the President must allocate duties to subordinates whose intents and purposes may not be of the same high purposes. The power that he and his subordinates may wield with honesty and fairness today may be violated by future rulers. Perhaps we can trust Mr. Roosevelt, but can we intrust our freedom, liberty, and pursuit of happiness to those who may succeed him, no matter from what political party they may spring?

When the President plainly states that he looks forward to permanent changes in our social and economic program and then he proposes greater concentration of power in the hands of a few men, we wonder if the suggestion does not occasion a respite for serious thought and study of our future. The trend at the moment may not be so serious, but the gradual drifting from democracy to concentrated governmental power gives rise to concern for the future. At least this is the time for discussion and determining our future course. It is easier to retain our principles of democracy now than to try and rescue them after we have let them slip away. Give thought to the future of your liberties.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, at the present time we are encouraging foreign trade. We are setting up a new bank, with $100,000,000, to encourage trade with Russia. I wonder what Russia is going to want to sell us. I have here the last report with reference to the tremendous experiment that is being put on over in Russia, and I find that there has been an increase in the yield of wheat, between 1932 and 1933, of 10.3 percent, in the case of rye an increase of 9.5 percent, an increase in all of such items all along the line. Why is that? Russia is getting more intensive cultivation. Yet we are going to have trade relations with Russia. What are they to sell us? They are going to sell us some of the very things whose production we are attempting to forbid under this machinery.

Now, let us go from the grains to the livestock. Hogs are raised in Russia. Some reference has been made to Iowa hogs, and we do think a lot of hogs out in Iowa. They are the cash in the pocketbooks. What do we find as to hogs in Russia? There was an increase in the number of hogs produced in Russia from 3,428 to 7,247 thousand head, an increase of practically 53 percent.

Is it supposed that we will sell much of our cured hams in Russia if we are going right on to establish trade relations with a country which produces in excess of the former amounts produced the very things whose production we are trying to curtail under this tremendous machinery being set up here legislatively in this country?

I ask unanimous consent that two tables, one covering grain, and the other covering livestock, from the Economic Review of the Soviet Union, be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I find in a Hearst newspaper of yesterday a statement with reference to liberty of the individual. I refer to an editorial which appeared in the Washington Herald. I do not ask that it all be inserted in the RECORD, but I ask that there be inserted in the RECORD that portion of the editorial which has reference to the Jeffersonian principles of government, and that which has to do with preserving the rights and the liberties of the American people.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Mar. 26, 1934]

THE POSITION OF THE HEARST NEWSPAPERS

In fact, they are not party organs of any kind.

They believe in the independence which Jefferson expressed in the great declaration of human rights and liberties which he conceived, and which the valor of our fathers wrought into a living force to inspire our people and regenerate the world.

They believe in government by the Constitution of the United States and under the guaranties of liberty and opportunity and impartial justice which that instrument contains.

They do not believe in any radical departure from the spirit of the Constitution.

They do not believe in limitations upon liberty, restrictions upon opportunity, modifications or qualifications of essential justice and equality before the law.

They do not believe in any invasion of the inherent or inherited rights of the free citizens of this Republic.

They believe in American institutions and in the American system of government, which have been tried and proven by the power and by the progress and by the peacefulness and happiness and by the splendid success of this greatest of all nations upon the face of God's globe.

They do not believe in appropriating fragments of impractical policy picked up from the political scrap heaps of alien nations less free, less fortunate, less progressive, and less successful than our own.

They do not believe in so-called "innovations" which are actually as old as the history of human failure.

The Hearst papers believe in the elemental principles of Thomas Jefferson, founder of the Democratic Party, and in the almost identical principles of Abraham Lincoln, disciple of Jefferson and founder of the Republican Party; and the Hearst papers hold as their guiding policy in the honorable practice of the profession of independent journalism, Lincoln's injunction to support any man when he is right and oppose him when he is wrong.

If that be party treason, make the most of it.

It is at least loyalty to the best interests of the Nation.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I think this bill would be absolutely impractical in its operation. I do not believe it is constitutional. I am fully convinced it would be no more beneficial in its effect than has been much of the legislation we have already passed. I believe it would be a great disappointment to the cotton farmers of the South. I hope we will at least have the courage here in the Congress to say that the emergency does not permit us to lose all of our balance and that we will not follow the emergency into a lot of entangling, misguided legislative policies which will handicap recovery in the days that are to come.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment and on the bill has expired.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE STATE, JUSTICE, ETC., DEPARTMENTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate nos. 1, 19, and 21 to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, and concurring therein.

Also receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate no. 5 and concurring therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert:

"COST-OF-LIVING ALLOWANCE, FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

"To carry out the provisions of the act approved February 23, 1931 (U.S.C., supp. VI, title 22, secs. 12, 23c) relating to allowances and/or additional compensation to diplomatic, consular, and Foreign Service officers and/or clerks when such allowances and/or additional compensation are necessary to enable such officers and/or clerks to carry on their work efficiently: Provided, That such allowances and/or additional compensation shall be granted only in the discretion of the President, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, $300,000, of which amount not to exceed $100,000 shall be immediately available."

Also receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8 and concurring therein with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert: "$3,500; in all, $579,948, together with such additional sums, due to increases in rates of exchange as may be necessary to pay in foreign currencies the quotas and contributions required by the several treaties, conventions, or laws establishing the amount of the obligation for the fiscal years 1934 and 1935."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, inasmuch as these two amendments are largely matters of language in the bill, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the Senate amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether any amendments made by the Senate to the bill as it passed the House which are material in character were rejected by the conferees.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, some were rejected and some agreed to, and some were agreed to with amendments, as is done in connection with all appropriation bills. The agreement was a compromise to a very large extent. But most of the amendments have already been agreed to. Those now before the Senate are two amendments in which the House has changed the language of a Senate amendment, first, that as to the cost of living, and that relating to additional appropriations made necessary by fluctuations in exchange. The language was clarified. It is for that reason that I have moved that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to concur in the House amendments to Senate amendments numbered 5 and 8.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On March 26, 1934:

S. 2728. An act to repeal Federal liquor prohibition laws to the extent they are in force in the Territory of Hawaii.

On March 27, 1934:

S. 2534. An act to further extend the operation of the act entitled "An act for the temporary relief of water users on irrigation projects constructed and operated under the reclamation law", approved April 1, 1932.

REGULATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have listened for the past year with a great deal of interest to the remarks submitted by various and sundry Members of this body, particularly as related to the destruction of property. I have never yet been able to understand why, in a country like the United States, where there are 125,000,000 people, of whom millions upon millions are, and for several years for that matter, have been hungry, and starving, and undernourished, and ragged, and naked, we of this Nation, who are supposed to be God-fearing, civilized citizens, should indulge in willful destruction of food for which millions upon millions of people are crying and praying at this very hour.

I never have yet been able to understand why we are persistently calling for the destruction, even now at this hour, of cotton when millions upon millions of men and women of all conditions and creeds are crying and wishing and praying for raiment with which to cover their naked bodies. It may be all right, it may work out all right, but my common sense does not convince me of that, and I never will be convinced of that until the experiment shall have been tried and proven unquestionably to be a success.

Confining my remarks to the particular subject we have now under discussion, it is said that there are in the warehouses of this country millions upon millions of bales of cotton in the form of surplus. That is true. Today this Government is paying to the warehousemen exorbitant sums of money for the purpose of keeping that cotton in good condition.

Why have we that surplus of cotton? We have the surplus of cotton for the same reason that we have a surplus of pigs, for the same reason that we have a surplus of wheat, for the same reason that we have a surplus of corn, for the same reason that we have a surplus of shoes, of clothing, of hats, of farm implements, a surplus of every single thing that grows or is manufactured in this country. The reason for that surplus is that the people of the United States have not had the money with which to buy the surplus. That is the only reason on God's earth why today there is a surplus of everything in this country.

We have talked about a surplus of cotton. Mr. President, if every man and woman in the United States who is today wearing cotton socks which are footless or have holes in them, or have been darned time and again, had the money with which to buy new cotton socks, that surplus would be greatly reduced. If today every man and woman in this country who have been accustomed to use and who are now using cotton nightshirts and nightgowns which have been worn so long that there is not a thing left but a little fringe around the neck, and who may just as well not have anything on when going to bed, were to buy some cotton nightshirts and cotton nightgowns, I am convinced that we would see the cotton surplus wilt like the morning dew before the glow of the rising sun.

If every man and woman in this country who are desirous of getting cotton shirts or cotton dresses, and who have been wearing the old ones year after year, like that good woman described in the letter read upon the floor of the Senate by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] the other day, had the money with which to replenish their simple wardrobes by replacing the old worn garments with new ones, there would not be any surplus of cotton at this hour in the United States.

The main trouble with the country today, Mr. President, is a fundamental one. There is only one serious trouble with the United States of America, and that trouble, Mr. President and Senators, will never be eradicated until there shall be more money in circulation in this land of ours.

A few years ago there were seven and one half billion dollars in circulation in this country, backed by about four or five billion dollars of gold. Today the situation is worse. We have only about $5,000,000,000 in circulating currency, or rather currency that is supposed to be in circulation, backed by gold to the extent of $8,000,000,000. There is but one thing wrong with the country today, Mr. President, and that is there is not enough money in circulation, and I can prove that to the satisfaction of anyone who will listen to reason.

The American people are in debt to the extent of approximately $250,000,000,000 to $275,000,000,000. The American people cannot pay their debts. Individuals cannot liquidate their obligations. Why? Because they do not have the money with which to liquidate their just and honest obligations, which they are desirous of paying.

Mr. President, why do we not sell the millions upon millions of bales of surplus cotton? It is simply because we will not adopt that medium of exchange which is utilized and which is in operation among 60 percent of the peoples inhabiting the globe. We are not able to dispose of our cotton; we are not able to dispose of our wheat; we are not able to get the prices for tobacco which we want to get for our farmers in North Carolina—the greatest tobacco-growing area in the world—because we are not willing to use the medium of exchange which is utilized by 60 percent of the 2,000,000,000 people upon the globe.

In that connection I respectfully call to the attention of the Members of this body the fact that the very countries on this earth which would like to purchase all the surplus cotton we grow are those countries which make use of silver as a medium of exchange. In India, 12,000 miles from the shores of America, there are 350,000,000 people, 98 percent of whom are clothed exclusively in raiment manufactured from cotton. The medium of exchange in India is silver. It is quite true that India is a part of the British Empire, but, regardless of that, if our country were to adopt silver as a medium of exchange, trading upon that basis in the same way as we now are and as we have for many years past traded upon the gold basis, we should not have any surplus cotton in this country.

If, perchance, after having traveled from the shore lines of that great country of the Orient to the peaks of Nepal in northern India, we found that those 350,000,000 souls could not use up our entire surplus, all we would have to do would be to wend our way to the shores of China, with its 500,000,000 inhabitants.

The Chinese, like the people in India, make use of cotton clothing and use our cotton. Someone may say that India raises its own cotton. Someone may put forward the argument that Russia, China, and Egypt do likewise. That is true.

The cotton produced in India, so I have been informed by those who are eminently qualified to discuss the question, does not come in competition with American cotton because the grade is not so good. The cotton of Russia, which that country has but recently begun to raise, is not so good as the American cotton, although they have had for several years experts from the southern portion of the United States instructing them in the growing of cotton. But even with the seed of the American cotton, the best on earth with the exception of the Egyptian cotton, they cannot produce one tenth or, for that matter, one twentieth of the amount of cotton they would like to use in the great Soviet Union of seven States, occupying approximately one sixth of the entire globe.

Then there is China. Despite the fact that it has a population of between 400,000,000 and 600,000,000 people, that country has just begun, so to speak, the production of cotton, and, speaking conservatively, they cannot grow one tenth of what they need in their country.

In Egypt, as we all know, they are now engaged in growing cotton of a certain quality which is adaptable for the making of cords in automobile tires and for the weaving of thread.

I am not concerned here today, as has been suggested by some of my colleagues, with the proposition that we may encourage cotton production in other portions of the world if we pass the pending bill. I am not afraid of that. That is no bugaboo to me, despite the further fact that I have but recently read in the columns of the newspapers where the Japanese, desirous of expanding their territory, which soon must be expanded in some direction, are contemplating the establishment of colonies in some of the South American countries for the raising of cotton.

We need have no fear from that source; we need have no fear of competition from Egypt, from India, from Russia, or from China for the present; but I say, Mr. President, that what we should have done we have not done, and if the pending measure had been delayed, and if other legislation of a cognate character had been delayed until after more currency had been put into circulation in this country, then such legislation would not be necessary. Month after month, year in and year out, the Congress of the United States has overlooked the two fundamentals, the two important things that would long since have brought to this land and to every single man and woman who basks within the warmth of its sunshine a return of prosperity. I will refer to those two fundamentals. First, if we had decided to issue currency upon silver as a base, today we would be trading with and would have a large portion of the commerce of 60 percent of the population of the entire globe; and, second, Mr. President, I say today that if we should pass the bonus bill and pay to the soldiers of the World War the money which the Congress of the United States said belonged to them, not as a bonus but as compensation, it would put into circulation in this country $2,200,000,000; it would place money in circulation in every single nook and corner in this land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from British Columbia to Florida, money that the people must have in order that they may buy the necessities of life, and thereby absorb the surplus.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The time of the Senator from North Carolina on the amendment has expired. He has 15 minutes on the bill.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to say further that the main trouble with this country is that it is debt ridden. What do I mean by that? When I say that this country is debt ridden I mean that 90 percent of the people of the United States are burdened down with debts and obligations and mortgages and commitments which they cannot shake off, and they will never be able to shake from their withered, weakened shoulders those burdens until they shall be provided with the means by which they may discharge their obligations.

If every man and if every woman—and I am speaking of individuals—living within the confines of these United States were provided a means (currency) by which he or she could pay his or her debts, this would be the happiest nation on earth; the State governments would not be in difficulty; the Federal Government would have no worry about its 30 or 34 billion dollars of obligations.

Let us now get right down to the bottom; let us use a little common sense. The strength of a county depends upon the strength of its inhabitants. There are in the United States approximately 3,200 counties, constituting, as it were, the respective 48 States, and they, in turn, constituting, as it were, this, the greatest Government on earth. I shall take, for illustration, the county of Transylvania in my beloved State of North Carolina; high in the Appalachian Range, and, incidentally, not far withdrawn from the fine old State of Tennessee, which is represented in part so ably by my good friend from that State [Mr. McKELLAR]. In the county of Transylvania, as we find in every other county in the United States, 80 percent of the people are burdened down with debt; 80 percent of the people have not the money with which to liquidate their just and honest obligations, which they are desirous of discharging. Without a single individual living in that county, without a single person working in its timberlands, felling its trees, or tilling its soil, that county would not be worth one cent to the State of North Carolina as a political unit of one of the 48 States of the Union, but if we could lift the burden of debt from the shoulders of the people living in that county, we would have a model county in the United States.

I repeat, no county is stronger than the people living therein; no county government is better than the individuals residing within its confines. Then, if we would advance one step farther, and lift the great burden of taxation from the shoulders of the people of every single county in the United States, we would have reached the pinnacle of success. But I say to you, Mr. President, that the indebtedness of this country will never be liquidated; the people of this country will never find the means with which to discharge their respective debts and obligations, until they shall be provided with the means with which to do it; and the only way in the world that such provision may be made will be by putting more money into the hands of the people of this land of ours.

All over this country thousands upon thousands of homesteads and thousands upon thousands of farms are being sold under the hammer, wielded either by the auctioneer who calls for the highest bidder for the property that is mortgaged, or wielded by the tax collector in the various political subdivisions. I say that those homes are being sold, that those mortgages are being foreclosed, on account of the nonpayment of the mortgages, on account of the nonpayment of taxes. Why? Because the people have not had the money with which to pay; and by continuing to refuse to expand the currency of this country, by continuing to refuse to put more money into circulation, what are we doing? We are destroying man's desire to own a home; we are destroying man's desire to rear a family; we are destroying man's desire to stand behind the great Government of America, because who ever heard of any man shouldering a musket in defense of a boarding house? And if present conditions shall continue, we will have them all in boarding houses rather than sitting around their own firesides.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. In connection with what the Senator is saying, during the course of what I think is one of the most able expositions of this subject made in the Senate since I have been here, let me say that we have today $5,000,000,000 of currency with a 59-cent dollar as against the time we deplored under Hoover when we had $7,000,000,000 of currency in 100-cent dollars. So instead of expanding our currency we have contracted it 0.59 of five billion instead of 100 percent of seven billion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have heard it stated on the floor here that in the Valley of the Nile, that intriguing, that lovely, that interesting region of northern Africa, plans are being made to put under cultivation some twelve to fifteen million acres of cotton. I have heard it stated here that in certain sections of India, that far-away land of the Orient, astute politicians and statesmen of the British Empire are holding in reserve some ten or twelve million acres of land for the purpose of cultivating cotton. That may be true, and I shall not make denial thereof; but I repeat, Mr. President, that at present I am not afraid of competitors from other sections of the world. Our Southland grows the finest staple of cotton—a particular staple—on earth, and the South will continue to grow it; the South will continue to lead in the exportation of cotton if—and I wish to emphasize that one little word “if”—if this country will make decision to issue currency backed by silver and thereby enable our people to trade with 60 percent of the peoples of the world who are accustomed to using silver as a medium of exchange.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I have naturally been very much interested in the eloquent argument being submitted by the Senator from North Carolina. I invite his attention to the fact that not only would the increase in the price of silver and the remonetization of silver help the cotton planter, but likewise it would help the manufacturer of cotton textiles and also the tobacco manufacturers of the South.

At the present time, by reason of the depreciated price of silver, cotton factories are starting up in Shanghai, Hong Kong, and other Chinese cities. Every time such a factory starts up—and they are doing so by reason of the low price of silver—it puts people out on the streets in the Senator's State and throughout the industrial East.

What is true with reference to cotton is likewise true with reference to the manufacture of cigarettes and other tobacco products. A few years ago, when the price of silver was higher and more in proportion to the value of our money, the Chinese bought their cigarettes from this country. Today English, Japanese, and American manufacturers have gone to China and are manufacturing cigarettes over there because, with the cheap price of silver and labor and their depreciated money, they can undersell American manufacturers in the United States market. It not only affects the cotton industry in the State of North Carolina but it likewise affects the tobacco industry.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am very happy indeed to have had that enlightening statement from the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, it is said that this kind of legislation is materially necessary. Granting, sir, that it is materially necessary at this hour, I am desirous of saying that it is necessary at this hour perhaps because we have failed and persistently refused to issue currency backed by silver, because we have failed and persistently refused to pay the bonus in the form of new money that would have distributed $2,200,000,000 all over the United States, $2,200,000,000 with which the people of this land could have made purchases of a vast portion of the surplus cotton in the form of manufactured goods in which cotton is used.

I was distinctly impressed a moment ago when my colleague, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] made the statement of fact that recently he had observed in the columns of one of the newspapers, and I now recall something of that nature, an item to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture had stated that he would not be at all surprised if in a few years a million farmers from the South and Southwest would have to be removed to the North. Mr. President, if we shall continue to limit acreage, if we shall continue to refuse an expansion of the currency, if we shall continue to cut down our crop production in any form whatsoever and at the same time shall continue to refuse to expand the currency or to issue currency upon a silver basis, that very thing will have been accomplished, and that will be a sad day for all America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina on the amendment and the bill has expired.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am informed that the bill (H.R. 1) to provide for controlled expansion of the currency and the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates has been referred to the Committee on Finance.

At this time I present an amendment in the nature of a substitute for that bill, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment in the nature of a substitute will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will read the first paragraph of the proposed substitute, which will itself explain the difference between it and the measure for which it is offered as a substitute:

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to pay in cash to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of his certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), an amount equal to the amount of his adjusted-service credit, as computed in accordance with section 201, plus interest on the amount of such adjusted-service credit at the rate of 4½ percent per annum compounded annually from November 11, 1918, to the date of payment.

No one disputes the fact—

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is the substitute a long one? I should like to hear the remainder of it read if the Senator will do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will have that done if the Senator wishes.

There is no doubt at all that the amount of the adjusted-service credit is due to the soldier. That was established by act of Congress. In my opinion that debt should have been paid immediately. I do not see why the Government should have borrowed money from the soldier instead of borrowing it from lending sources such as banks. However, the Government went into an insurance system and gave the soldier an insurance policy maturing in 20 years. The confusion that has arisen over this plan, the suffering it has caused to the ex-service men, the injury it has done generally not only to the morale of our veterans, but to all those interested in them, could not be compensated by the fact that the men would be protected for 20 years and in case they died that their dependents would be compensated under the insurance policy.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I do not think I quite understand the point of what the Senator said. If this adjustment had been made prior to the expiration of the period to be adjusted, would the ex-service man have been paid the full amount he would have received if he had waited until the end of the period?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have set forth the purpose in the simplest possible language in the paragraph which I just read. We owed this money to the soldier at least on Armistice Day. Whatever was due him as computed on Armistice Day, he is now entitled to be paid plus interest from that time until the date it is paid.

Mr. FESS. He was to get $1.25 a day if his service was overseas. The maximum would be about $625 if he had been paid at once, and it would be about $1,900 if he waits until the end of the 20 years. If we pay it at this time, would it mean a computation based on the $625 up to this time?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct. I have requested General Hines to prepare an analysis showing the cash value of the certificates now, the value of the certificates under the House bill, and the value of the certificates under the proposed amendment which I have offered. These figures are set out in parallel columns showing the result of the computation, and the various results may be easily discovered.

Mr. FESS. What about those who borrowed under the privilege we gave them some time ago?

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no change in that particular from the bill coming from the House. All liens on a certificate, of course, will be first deducted from the payment.

There is another provision to which I wish to invite attention. Instead of issuing Government notes in settlement of these certificates, the amendment proposes that the Government shall issue its bonds or credits or notes for a period up to, we will say, 1945, and that that money shall be placed in the veterans' fund to carry out the purposes of the act. It differs in no particular except that the money is obtained on bonds rather than in any other form.

There is still another provision in the amendment, and that is this:

In addition to the general assets that would go into the sinking fund for the settlement of the certificates in 1945, it is provided that the seigniorage from the purchase of 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver during the period until 1945 shall also be put into the sinking fund for the purpose of retiring the bonds as and when they fall due.

Those are the principal provisions of the amendment.

Now, I have described the amendment. I ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks at this point rather than to take the time to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment (in the nature of a substitute) intended to be proposed by Mr. PITTMAN to the bill (H.R. 1) to provide for controlled expansion of the currency and the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That title V of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof new sections to read as follows:

"PAYMENT OF CERTIFICATES BEFORE MATURITY"

"Sec. 509. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to pay in cash to any veteran to whom an adjusted-service certificate has been issued, upon application by him and surrender of his certificate and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), an amount equal to the amount of his adjusted-service credit, as computed in accordance with section 201, plus interest on the amount of such adjusted-service credit at the rate of 4½ percent per annum compounded annually from November 11, 1918, to the date of payment.

"(b) No payment shall be made under this section until the certificate is in the possession of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, nor until all obligations for which the certificate was held as security have been paid or otherwise discharged.

"(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section, the veteran's certificate is held by a bank or for the United States Government life-insurance fund as security for the unpaid principal and/or interest on or in respect of a loan made pursuant to section 502, then, on request of the veteran, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of the unpaid interest as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount payable under this section such amounts as may be required to discharge the indebtedness together with interest thereon to date of payment to the veteran.

"(d) Upon payment under this section the certificate and all rights thereunder shall be canceled.

"(e) A veteran may receive the benefits of this section by application therefor, filed with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. Such application may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations, or not filed on or before the maturity of the certificate, shall be held void.

"(f) If the veteran dies after application is made and before the issuance of check in payment of the benefits provided by this section, the application shall be held void.

"Sec. 510. If at the time this section takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor, he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302, as amended, to receive, at his option, either the certificate under section 501 or payment of the amount provided under section 509.

"Sec. 511. Amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund are hereby authorized to be made available for payments authorized in sections 509 and 510."

"ISSUE OF SECURITIES AND SINKING FUND"

"Sec. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow, from time to time, under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, such amounts as may be necessary to make the payments provided for by sections 509 and 510 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, or to refund any obligations previously issued under this section, and to issue therefor bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, or Treasury bills of the United States. The proceeds derived from any obligations issued under this section shall be covered into the adjusted-service certificate fund established by section 505 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, and are hereby appropriated and shall be available for making the payments provided for by sections 509 and 510 of such act, as amended. All obligations issued pursuant to this section shall be retired on or before July 1, 1945.

"(b) For the purpose of retiring the obligations issued under subsection (a) of this section there is hereby created a sinking fund, and all amounts covered into such fund as hereinafter provided and such further sums as may from time to time be required for the purpose of retiring any such obligations are hereby appropriated and shall be available for such purpose.

"PURCHASE OF SILVER"

"Sec. 3. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed during the period of 11 years, commencing July 1, 1934, to purchase not in excess of 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver at the market price and to pay for such silver by means of silver certificates; except that in the event that the market price of silver exceeds 64½ cents an ounce the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue to purchase silver only at such prices and in such amounts as he may determine. The silver so purchased shall be used for the coinage of standard silver dollars in an amount equal to the face value of such silver certificates, and the standard silver dollars so coined shall be held in the Treasury for the redemption of such certificates. Silver certificates shall be issued against the silver so purchased and not used for such coinage, and such certificates shall be covered into the sinking fund provided for in section 2 of this act and may be exchanged from time to time, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for any obligations of the United States. The silver certificates issued under this section shall be of the same character and shall have and possess all the privileges and the legal-tender characteristics of existing silver certificates now in the Treasury of the United States, or in circulation.

"(b) There shall also be covered into such sinking fund all amounts received as seigniorage and for services performed by the Government of the United States relative to the coinage and delivery of silver dollars, and, in the event that the weight of the silver dollar shall at any time be reduced, an amount equal to the increase in value of any silver held by the United States resulting from such reduction."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now for a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. Is the amendment permissive, so that one who prefers to wait until the end of the time can wait?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is permissive. None of the supposed benefits under the existing law are taken away from the ex-service man.

Mr. FESS. And the money would not be paid by the issue of what we call "greenbacks"?

Mr. PITTMAN. It would not be paid in Government notes as provided in the original bill, but it would be paid in money derived from the sale of bonds, notes, or other securities of the Government.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. At this point I also desire to place in the RECORD an analysis of the existing law and an analysis of the amendment I am now offering as a substitute for the House bill in exact form as prepared. What I am placing in the RECORD is the letter from General Hines, and several forms of analysis of the results of the present law, the House bill, and the amendment I am offering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter designated by the Senator will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, March 26, 1934.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: In compliance with request contained in your letter of March 23, 1934, there is submitted herewith:

(a) Analysis of Pittman substitute for H.R. 1 on basis of computing present value of certificates under existing law by granting only earned portion of additional credit.

(b) Analysis of Pittman substitute for H.R. 1 on basis of computing present value of certificates under existing law by granting whole portion of additional credit.

(c) Condensed historical outline of basic facts regarding World War Adjusted Compensation Act.

(d) Statistical statement of certificates issued, certificates matured, loans, etc.

I desire to assure you that any further information which you may desire will, upon request, be gladly furnished to you.

Respectfully,

FRANK T. HINES,
Administrator.

The act of May 19, 1924, provides for each veteran having held a rank below that of lieutenant commander in the Navy or major in the Army or Marine Corps, receiving as adjusted compensation, after deduction was made for the first 60 days of service for which a cash settlement was made at the time of discharge, credit at the rate of $1 per day for service in the United States and $1.25 per day for service overseas.

Those veterans entitled to $50 or less had their adjusted-service credit paid to them immediately, and those whose credits totaled in excess of $50 secured entitlement to receive upon application an adjusted-service certificate. If the veteran died before making application for the benefits conferred by the act, certain surviving dependents were privileged to apply for and receive the adjusted-service credit, either in one sum or 10 equal quarterly installments, according to the amount payable, the dividing line being the same as that fixed for the veteran himself as determinative as to whether he would receive cash or an adjusted-service certificate—that is, $50.

The adjusted-service credit inuring to a veteran who was to have issued to him an adjusted-service certificate was increased by 25 percent because of the payment thereof being deferred. Dependents of deceased veterans who received an amount which would have been, had the veteran been alive, sufficient to entitle the veteran to an adjusted-service certificate, did not have 25 percent added to the adjusted-service credit.

The amount shown on the face of an adjusted-service certificate represents the maturity value of a 20-year endowment life-insurance policy, for that is actually in substance what the adjusted-service certificate is. In the average case the maturity value approximates two and one half times the amount of the adjusted-service credit computed on the basis of the adjustment of $1 and $1.25 a day.

The maturity value of the certificate was arrived at by using the adjusted-service credit increased by 25 percent as a net single premium according to the American Experience Table of Mortality, with interest at 4 percent per annum, compounded annually, in the same manner as any insurance company would fix the amount of a 20-year endowment insurance policy purchased on a net single-premium basis.

The act of May 19, 1924, provided each certificate with a loan value in an amount represented by 90 percent of the reserve value of the certificate on the last day of the current certificate year, the reserve value to be the full reserve required on such certificates based on an annual level net premium for 20 years and calculated in accordance with the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 percent per annum compounded annually, no certificate, however, to be eligible for the purpose of securing a loan until after the expiration of 2 years from the date of issuance thereof. The maximum rate of interest to be charged on such loans was first limited to not more than 2 percent per annum above the discount rate for 90-day commercial paper in the Federal Reserve district in which the loan was made. Originally only incorporated banks and trust companies were permitted to make loans on these certificates, but the amendment of March 3, 1927, provided for the Government making such loans as a trustee of the United States Government life-insurance fund. The amendatory legislation of February 27, 1931, further extended the facilities for making loans to the adjusted-service-certificate fund, which is the reserve fund for adjusted-service certificates, statutorily increased the loan value to 50 percent of the maturity value of the certificates, thus discarding the actuarial basis which formerly obtained, and limited the amount of interest which might be charged on such loans to 4½ percent.

The law was further amended under date of July 21, 1932, so as to fix the maximum amount of interest which might be charged at 3½ percent and eliminated the requirement that 2 years elapse from the date of issuance before a certificate might be used for the purpose of securing a loan thereon, so that at the present time, while the reserve value of the certificate is accumulating to the veteran's credit at the rate of 4 percent per annum compounded annually, the amount which may be charged veterans on account of loans secured thereon may not exceed 3½ percent.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I also ask that these data from General Hines, together with his letter, after their publication in the RECORD, be referred to the Finance Committee as accompanying the bill and amendment that will be referred there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be so referred.

Mr. PITTMAN. I realize that another subject is under debate, and therefore I have tried to hasten the explanation of this matter. The amendment will, of course, now go to the committee. Any Senator who is interested in the terms of the amendment other than those I have described, of course, will find them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tomorrow morning.

Mr. President, as I said before, in the effort of legislators to protect the future of our ex-service men and their heirs or dependents, we adopted this insurance system. It has not worked successfully. As I said before, it has caused a great deal of discontent. We have forced upon the veterans an insurance policy, payable out of their money, without their consent and against their wishes. That is about all it amounts to. It is based entirely on an insurance system, interest, liabilities, and things of that kind; but if any veteran desires to retain his certificate, in which case he probably would make more out of it than he would under the measure now proposed, he is at liberty to retain it.

I am attempting by this amendment to present something that may become law. I think it is not only futile to introduce bills and offer amendments and propose legislation in Congress that we have reason to believe and do believe never can become law but it is worse than that; it is a deception of the very men and women whom we are assuming to protect, and for whose interests we assert that we are working.

I say that because I do not believe there is a 1-percent chance of House bill 1, in its present form, becoming a law, at least at this time. I believe that these soldiers are so justly entitled to the money they earned, which we said was due them for their services up until the Armistice, at least, that I should be perfectly willing, instead of borrowing the money from them, to borrow the money from the banks of this country, and transfer the loan from the soldiers to the banks. I cannot conceive that it means anything else on earth. The same sinking fund to redeem these certificates in 1945 must be carried on whether it be carried on to pay the certificates or to pay the bonds issued in lieu of the certificates. There will be no greater cost to the Government under the proposal I have submitted. I am satisfied there is tremendous opposition in Congress, at least in the Senate, to issuing Government notes such as are called "greenbacks" by the Senator from Ohio. That action alone might cause a Senator to vote against this measure who would vote for it if that provision were not in the bill.

I come down now to the other proposition of adding silver as a method of establishing a sinking fund to pay the interest and pay off the bonds at maturity.

The Government of the United States has already made, since 1873, $285,000,000 in profit on what is called "seigniorage" on silver. That means that the Government has bought silver, we will say, at 50 cents an ounce, and it has coined that silver into subsidiary coin at a valuation of $1.38 an ounce, and has sold that coin to the banks and commerce for gold at the value of $1.38 an ounce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will speak on the bill.

As I say, that profit was $285,000,000, and it lies in the Treasury today as a profit called "seigniorage". Today we are circulating silver certificates in lieu of silver dollars. Those silver certificates have a purchasing power of $1.29 an ounce. The silver was received from Great Britain on her war debt at the rate of 50 cents an ounce. Today, therefore, our Government is making 79 cents an ounce on the 20,000,000 ounces of silver so received. This amendment proposes that the Government shall proceed to buy silver at the market price with silver certificates. In other words, whoever deposits silver in the Treasury of the United States will get a certificate of deposit for it which will circulate as a silver certificate, such as there are now $500,000,000 of them circulating in the United States, and have been for over 50 years. They are full legal-tender certificates.

If silver were purchased today at the market price of 45 cents an ounce, the Government then would make about 84 cents an ounce on every ounce of silver it so bought. This seigniorage, this profit, would be placed in this particular fund for the eventual redemption of the bonds issued to raise the money to redeem these certificates.

That brings us back again to the question which has been discussed so often and which I shall only take a moment to discuss.

I wish to say that there should not exist in this country today the prejudice against silver money that has existed in the past. There have been many changes since the old fight of the Bryan days. Our country has grown enormously since that time, not only in population but in commerce and in wealth. We have changed from a debtor nation to a creditor nation. The gold standard that we established in 1873 has gone out of existence. The gold that we own today is held only in the hope that some day, somehow, we may be able to utilize its value and its limitation upon currency issue. Great Britain and the United States have both ceased to have a gold standard. The only metallic standard we have today is silver, strange to say.

When our Government started we had what was called "true bimetalism"; that is, we said that a gold dollar should consist of 24.6 grains of gold, and a silver dollar should consist of 371¼ grains of silver. In other words, there were approximately 15 times as many grains of silver in a silver dollar as there were grains of gold in a gold dollar.

This was changed, finally, by reducing the gold content of the dollar down to 23.2 grains, which makes our present ratio between the two metals about 16 to 1. Until 1873 any one owing a debt could pay it in either kind of a dollar. In 1873 we made the gold dollar the sole standard of value, and then guaranteed to maintain the parity of the silver dollar and all other currency with it.

Mr. President, for centuries, down to 1816, the whole world was on a bimetallic basis. For thousands and thousands of years both metals had been used as mediums of exchange, as money, at substantially the same ratio as that we are using in the United States today. We have not had to do anything to maintain the parity of the silver dollar with the gold dollar. Somebody had a little scare about it prior to this century, but it has continued. Today the only metallic currency in this country is silver, in the form of $285,000,000 in dimes, half dollars, and quarters, and about $525,000,000 of standard silver dollars. There was 40 percent gold behind the Federal Reserve notes. Today there is no gold behind them; it is in the Treasury of the United States. It may be said that the Federal Reserve banks have some kind of a lien on it. They have no lien on it that can be enforced.

The intrinsic value today behind the silver dollar is the market value of the silver in it, which today is 45 cents an ounce, or 35 percent. So that there is intrinsic value of 35 percent behind the silver dollar today, and nothing of intrinsic value, in the nature of metal, behind the Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The reason why they are worth dollar for dollar is that the Treasury is required to maintain the parity, is it not, under the act of 1900?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly; I have already passed that. They have never had to do anything to maintain the parity, but they are required to maintain it. I am talking about whether or not silver today is fiat money.

Mr. CONNALLY. Silver is token money, most certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know that a piece of paper which we pass around has no intrinsic value. I know that a chunk of silver which we pass out and call a dollar has today 35 percent intrinsic value, because we can sell the silver anywhere in the world for 35 cents.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is worth 35 cents, not because it is a dollar but because it is so much silver.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is worth $1.29 an ounce, because it circulates in the payment of debts in this country at $1.29 an ounce.

Mr. CONNALLY. And the paper dollar is worth a dollar because it is redeemable in gold.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was worth it because it could be exchanged for gold.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that the value of the paper dollar is the result of its being redeemable in some sort of metal which has an intrinsic value?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly; but today, in the unfortunate fix in which we find ourselves, with gold which we cannot use and do not intend to use until we establish another system, we have today $800,000,000 worth of silver in actual circulation in this country, moving from the pockets of the people, in circulation. I doubt whether there is today very much more than that of any other kind of money in circulation from pocket to pocket in this country. Some say that money in banks is circulating, but we know it does not circulate very fast.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I understood the Senator from Texas, I do not know that the Senator from Nevada quite apprehended his interrogatory; at least, I did not.

As I understood the Senator—and I would not agree with that, however—he said that the silver certificates have value only because they are redeemable in gold and because the parity is maintained. My opinion is that a government which has the credit of the United States, at least the credit we had a few years ago, might issue a very large amount of paper money, not redeemable in gold or redeemable in silver, and declare it to be receivable in payment of all debts, public and private, and it would circulate alongside gold and silver, and meet all of the obligations, and discharge all of the liabilities, have all the attributes which appertain to gold and silver.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it comes down to the two schools of thought: one the school of managed currency, which is subject to the human will, human judgment, and human frailty, which has failed so often throughout the world in connection with monetary systems. Personally, I belong to the school which feels that we should tie our currency to nature. Nature is immutable. The metals, in their relations to each other and in their quantities, are just as immutable as is our solar system. The ratio of gold to silver, silver to copper, copper to zinc, and zinc to iron has been proven to be as uniform and as positive as the laws of chemistry. Every reason, every argument, which applies to gold as money applies equally and with the same force to silver as money. Its indestructible character, its scarcity, its general distribution throughout the world, the knowledge that it has been money from time immemorial, its acceptance everywhere as money apply with equal force to silver as to gold.

If one believes in a managed currency, then he does not believe that we need gold or silver. But I approve metallic currency for the reasons I have suggested, and for the higher and better reason that nature limits the production of both metals, and if the currency is limited by that natural law, then we do not have to trust to the frailties of human judgment, human cupidity, and human ignorance.

Therefore I say I believe in the metallic base, using both metals. I believe there is only enough gold in the world to utilize it in the settlement of international balances. I think that position is taken by the great economists of the world, that gold has to be kept in a closed circuit between the treasuries of the various governments, and that a clearing-house system must be used, based on that gold, for the purpose of settling international balances. If that be true—and I believe it is true—then we will either have domestic currency of a fiat nature or we will have it based on the only other precious metal—that is, silver—and that is the reason why I am coming down to that.

I do not care whether there is the single gold standard or a dual standard; those things are totally immaterial in my mind. We have no trouble whatever in maintaining the parity of the two metals on their natural production basis, and never will have.

We can measure the currencies of the world with gold for the purpose of international settlements of trade balances, because since 1873 the nations have used that measure. But there are countries which prefer to use silver, and we can in those cases use silver, and we can back our domestic currency with silver in this country and have not only a sound currency with intrinsic value behind it but a measure of limitation such as we have today. That is the reason why I feel we should take every step to bring into our Treasury not only a great gold reserve, such as we have, but also a great silver reserve, and we will have two valuable metals in the Treasury of this country.

I would therefore provide a means of getting this reserve and at the same time have the Government earn a large profit in the form of seigniorage, which will go to pay off the bonds, with the money derived from the sale of which we will pay the soldiers' certificates, and we will accomplish, in my opinion, several good purposes by the same act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Perhaps my statement to the Senator when I interrupted him may have been misunderstood. The meaning I intended to convey was that governments of prestige and strength have issued and may issue a limited amount of what has been called "flat money"; by others irredeemable paper, without disturbing results in their fiscal or monetary policies. I have always believed in hard money—gold and silver—the money of the Constitution, and have contended that the metallic base upon which rests our currency and credits should consist of gold and silver at a fixed ratio. That was the view of the founders of the Republic; that was the view of Hamilton and Jefferson when the first monetary bill was prepared following the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nevada has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will complete my statement in my own time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized.

Mr. KING. As I attempted to state, a government having resources and financial strength such as this Republic has had in its history, might issue a reasonable amount of what is denominated "flat money" and give to it the qualities of primary money. As a matter of fact our Government is issuing a large amount of currency which is based upon commercial paper and Government securities. These issues perform all the functions of money and are receivable in the payment of debts, public and private. The Senator from Nevada was correct in stating that the history of nations demonstrates that where there has not been a metallic base to support its currencies and credits there has been too often a disposition, particularly in hours of stress or peril, to issue large quantities of fiat money. The result has been that periods of inflation ensued, and in many instances culminated in the paper currency losing all value and being repudiated.

When in Russia a few years ago I discovered that the Bolshevik regime had issued hundreds of millions and indeed billions of rubles, without gold or silver upon which to rest the same. When the paper rubles were first issued by the Bolshevik regime they had some value measured by commodities and performed the functions of money, but as the obligations of the Government increased the issues of paper money became larger until finally the aggregate reached astronomical figures.

I remember that a pair of shoe strings which I purchased cost me many millions of rubles. I remained in Russia several months, and before my departure the Soviet Government issued a decree which in effect destroyed the paper rubles. The Government had made strenuous efforts to obtain gold and silver, and gold certificates in the United States and also British and other currencies, also considerable foreign exchange. When this was done a new issue of rubles was emitted based upon the gold and silver which had been carried as well as the exchange and foreign currencies referred to. It also issued a new gold coin called "chervonetz."

The Commissar of the Treasury took me into the vaults and showed me the accumulations referred to and stated that it was the purpose of the government to maintain at par their paper issues. I might add that this was done for several years and the Russian paper rubles circulated in Germany and other bordering countries at par. Later however, as the demands for credit increased, the Soviet Government was unable to obtain revenue to balance its budget and it again resorted to the issue of paper money without sufficient reserves or coverage. The result was as might have been expected that for a while the Russian currency fell below par and was at a discount in other countries.

The Russian situation just mentioned indicates that governments whose financial structure is sound may issue a considerable quantity of fiat money or what some call irredeemable paper, but, as stated, the temptation too often is so great that large issues are emitted; and when a breach is made in the wall of sound money and sound finance it will soon widen, permitting floods injurious to the financial integrity of the governments.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. What does the Senator mean when he says "irredeemable" paper currency?

Mr. KING. I used the expression, Mr. President, in its ordinary terminology: a currency not redeemable in gold or silver, not having a metallic base upon which to predicate it.

I gave to the word the interpretation which, as I understand, is usually placed upon it. Irredeemable paper money means paper not redeemable; that is not convertible into specie at the pleasure of the holder. When we were upon the gold standard our gold certificates were redeemable in gold; that is, they could be converted into gold at the option of the holder, and with gold and silver maintained at a parity as was the case for many years, the silver was redeemable in gold. Many countries have issued paper money which was not convertible into gold or silver or for that matter into any form of currency. It consisted of a mere declaration of the government issuing it that it was indebted to the holder to the amount named in the paper so issued.

Undoubtedly, if a government promises to pay a dollar, the presumption arises that it will meet the obligation. Our Government has issued silver certificates redeemable in silver and gold certificates, but they are not now redeemable in gold. Under the policy of the Government, as I understand, the holder of British notes may not have them redeemed in gold. Governments may issue printed obligations stating that the government owes the bearer a given sum. Such obligations may on their face indicate that they are not redeemable in specie or in anything whatever. They may be mere acknowledgments that the government has issued the same. The government may have provided by law that such obligations may be received in payment of obligations, public and private. If paid for taxes, they might be, in part at least, a redemption, but they would not be redeemable in specie. Obligations expressed upon a piece of paper issued by the government, which merely declared that the government was indebted to the holder in a given sum, would not obligate the government to pay in gold, unless there were statutes which in effect provided that such paper issued but, upon presentation, be redeemable in specie.

Let me call the Senator's attention to a matter which illustrates the point I am trying to make, but I concede that it is not an apt illustration. When the pioneers of Utah settled the territory they had no money. The territory then belonged to Mexico and it was some time before a territorial form of government was organized. The pioneers found that they must have a circulating medium and their great leader met the situation by issuing a limited amount of paper obligations signed by himself as president of the religious organization. The paper so issued declared, in effect, that the borrower was entitled to $1 or $5 or $10, payable by the organization issuing the same. There was no gold or silver behind the paper. It rested merely upon the integrity and moral responsibility of the religious organization issuing the same. It circulated, however, among the people and discharged all the functions of gold or silver money. Later persons passing through the country left small amounts of gold and silver in payment of commodities purchased by them, but this metallic money purchased no more and served no higher function than did the paper obligations which were circulated among the pioneers.

But, as I stated a moment ago, Mr. President—

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says they were promises to pay. To pay what? What was on the face of the paper? It was a promise to pay something.

Mr. KING. It was simply a promise of the church that it would pay.

Mr. CONNALLY. That it would pay what?

Mr. KING. Ten dollars or five dollars. That it would pay the amount stated on the I O U.

Mr. CONNALLY. In terms of metal?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. Were they payable in dollars?

But the Senator also said that they could issue a reasonable amount of that kind of money and it would be all right.

In order for such paper money to be all right it must be redeemable in something, must it not? Suppose the Government makes a promise to pay a dollar. What is the Government going to pay with when the time comes unless it is redeemable in some kind of commodity?

Mr. KING. The I O U said "dollars", but there were no dollars behind it. The word "dollars" operated as a measuring rod, but carried no promise to pay gold or silver or recognized coin of the realm.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. It may not have had a reserve behind it, but still the promise was to pay in a certain coin which did have a value.

Mr. KING. It said "dollars." It did not say "coin"; and it was understood there was no coin or specie of any kind behind it. It had no coin of any kind.

Mr. CONNALLY. The I O U said dollars; yes. While it did not have a reserve behind it, yet its value was based on the theory that when the time for payment came the Government would pay a dollar for every dollar that was promised to be paid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it was not the Government; it was the church organization; and the paper I O U's or obligations served the same purpose that shells or wooden shingles did when they were the currency of communities.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. REED. Irredeemable paper currency is pretty well illustrated by the type of note that was issued by the German Reichstag during the 1923-24 period. That merely said on the face of it "This is 1,000 marks" or "This is 1,000,000 marks." It was not anybody's promise to pay in metallic coin or anything else. It was merely a fiat that this piece of paper is the equivalent of so many million marks.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly; and that is why it was not worth anything. But if that had been based upon so many gold marks, and the people had faith in the Government redeeming it, it would have been worth something. That is the difference.

Mr. REED. Yes. Of course, if it is payable in gold, and the Government is solvent, it is worth par.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; then it is worth par.

Mr. REED. In the Civil War days we issued a lot of bills in which we promised to pay a dollar or a half dollar, or whatever it was, but the credit of the Government had sunk so far, and its ability to redeem in specie was so precarious, that those bills sank to about 30 percent of their face value. Such a contingency is what the Senator from Utah means by his statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. The reason for that was that no one had any confidence that the bills would be paid at par, but they were finally redeemed at par.

Mr. REED. It was because the Nation showed great courage.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Nation had courage and confidence, and redeemed them in full. The reason the bills were sold at 30 cents is that no one thought they would be redeemed.

Mr. REED. That is right. The Nation was not balancing its Budget. It was increasing its debt at a scandalous rate, and people did not think the Nation could make good on its promises.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, why does the Senator from Pennsylvania find it necessary to go to Germany to give illustrations of fiat money? Let him feel in his vest pocket and pull out a Treasury note now.

Mr. REED. The difference is that the Germans did not put a promise on the face of the note. We put a promise on the face of it, and then repudiated the promise.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; we put a promise on the face of the note and then repudiated the promise.

Mr. REED. Yes, precisely.

Mr. GLASS. So we are just as bad off as Germany was.

Mr. REED. Yes; but at least the money pretends to be worth something.

Mr. KING. I do not wish to be led into a discussion as to the effect of some of the legislation enacted by Congress during the past year. When interrupted by the Senator from Texas I was about to call attention to the issue of large quantities of continental paper money during the Revolutionary days. There was but little, if any, specie behind these issues. The Government did not pretend to redeem them in gold or silver. The amount of these issues was so great that their value was reduced almost to the vanishing point. The Confederacy issued paper money. It is true, as I recall, that these issues declared that they would be redeemed in specie. The Confederate money declined in value and when the war ended they possessed no value.

We are familiar with the French assignats. The first issue was not large and rested in part upon confiscated property. The needs of the Government for money increased and greater volumes of paper assignats were issued. All church property and the property of the nobles were confiscated and became the basis for the issued assignats. At last the aggregate issues were so great that they ceased to have any value, and the efforts made by the Government to compel their acceptance proved futile.

Mr. President, it is not profitable to discuss the results that would flow from unlimited issues of fiat money. It is obvious what calamities would follow such a course. The founders of this Republic possessed great political sagacity and had broad knowledge of financial and monetary matters. They were acquainted with the monetary policies of nations then existing as well as those that had been destroyed. With this comprehensive knowledge of governmental and monetary problems they declared, in substance, that gold and silver were the money of the Republic. They rested our financial system upon bimetallism; they declared that gold and silver should be receivable for all debts, public and private, and they opened the mints of the Government to the free coinage of both metals at a ratio fixed by them. They believed that with an abundant supply of gold and silver business would prosper, revenues would be produced, and general prosperity would be visited upon the people. They knew of the Spanish-milled dollar which was circulating in the New World, and they knew that the silver in many of the dollars came from the mines of Central and South America; they knew that with the discovery of the New World and when a stream of gold and silver poured across the Atlantic it resulted in awakening the rather moribund nations of Europe into a new life; business enterprises developed, trade and commerce increased, and forces making for cultural and industrial development were liberated to the direct advantage of the people of Europe and indirectly to the advantage of all peoples.

The gold and silver that went from the Old to the New World had a most profound effect in their activity and life. The economic and industrial development directly affected the educational and cultural life of the people. It is not too much to say that gold and silver have greatly influenced the peoples of all lands and have been an important civilizing factor and influence throughout the world. Examples are numerous to the effect that the decay of nations has in part been due to a lack of a sufficient circulating medium.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired on the amendment.

Mr. KING. I shall speak on the bill.

When Rome was at her zenith then her metallic supply of gold and silver was equivalent to $1,200,000,000. This large monetary supply—for that period—developed trade and commerce and brought nations and peoples into closer relationship.

Then came the Dark Ages. Gold and silver were lost or destroyed, until finally in the darkest period there were but $200,000,000 of gold and silver in the whole of Europe.

Some historians do not hesitate to attribute the decline of the Roman Empire, the decline in intelligence and growth and liberty and culture, to the loss of gold and silver, which had carried Rome to her former proud eminence. So when the gold mines of California poured their golden stream into the channels of trade we had a new development of business in all parts of the United States. When the gold mines of South Africa gave to the world hundreds of millions of dollars of gold there was an increased prosperity and great business activity not only in the British Empire but throughout the entire world.

A great wrong was committed when silver was stricken down; it will be a step, a righteous and just step, when silver shall be remonetized and the currencies and credit of the world, instead of resting upon the narrow base of gold, shall rest upon the broad base of both gold and silver.

REGULATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], as modified.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, line 6, before the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, In no event shall the producer be taxed or penalized in the ginning or otherwise of the first 6 bales of 500 pounds weight each.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to be privileged to add to that amendment the following, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who is sponsoring this legislation:

Provided further, That the total allotment for the crop year 1934-35 shall not exceed 10,000,000 bales.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. [Putting the question.] The yeas seem to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for a division.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, we should like to have a record vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is asked for.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. On what are we voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote being taken on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. REYNOLDS. I understood, Mr. President, that the amendment to the amendment was acceptable to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who is sponsoring this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has exhausted his time. A division is requested on the amendment to the amendment.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, after line 10, it is proposed to insert the following:

(4) Cotton having a staple of 1½ inches in length or longer.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the pending bill provides that the production of all cotton shall be limited to 10,000,000 bales. My amendment will release from that limitation cotton having a staple of 1½ inches or longer. The only variety of cotton produced in the United States having a staple of 1½ inches or longer is so-called "American-Egyptian" or Pima cotton, which is grown in Arizona and southern California.

American-Egyptian cotton, grown commercially in the Southwest, normally has a staple of $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ inches, and is used in the manufacture of special products such as fine dress goods, shirtings, and, to some extent, tire fabrics, and sewing thread. It is not in competition with any cotton produced in the main Cotton Belt, where none of the varieties now grown commercially have a staple longer than about $1\frac{3}{8}$ inches. It does, however, compete with cotton of the same general type imported from Egypt.

In the characters of the plants, as well as of the lint, Egyptian cotton is very different from all other cotton grown in the United States. It differs even in the manner in which it is processed, being ginned on roller gins instead of saw gins.

That type of cotton, introduced into the United States about 30 years ago, was bred by the Department of Agriculture until it surpassed in length of staple and in tensile strength the original Egyptian cotton from which it was derived.

During the past 5 years there were imported from Egypt 279,000 bales of this variety of cotton, and there was introduced in the United States 71,000 bales. In other words, we do not produce cotton having a staple of $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches or longer in a sufficient quantity more than to supply one third of the American market. It therefore seemed to me that to reduce the acreage of a type of cotton of which we do not produce a sufficient quantity to supply the American market was not a wise thing to do. So I have offered this amendment exempting from the tax imposed by this bill cotton having a staple of $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches or longer.

I might add, Mr. President, that for all useful purposes this long-staple cotton might be considered as a crop other than cotton such as wool or mohair. It does not compete with the short-staple cotton grown in the Cotton Belt. It goes into fine threads, laces, and the manufacture of articles requiring great tensile strength.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona whether under the tariff protection which we gave to long-staple cotton there has been any substantial increase in the growth of that particular fiber?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can answer the Senator by saying that when it became evident that there would be an import duty imposed upon this type of cotton there were rushed into the United States shipload after shipload of long-staple cotton from Egypt, until there was piled up in this country a supply that lasted for nearly 2 years. On top of that came the business depression, which took away many of the uses of this type of cotton. The tariff, however, has had the effect of maintaining the growth of the long staple type of cotton in the United States, which otherwise I believe would have been utterly destroyed; it has caused the spinners to look at American long-staple cotton first, and now we are coming to the point where American producers can in a measure supply the American demand. Both the importation and the production of this type of cotton dropped off to a great extent by reason of the large surplus that had accumulated in this country prior to the time when the tariff was imposed.

It is hardly consistent, as the Senator will agree, to impose a tariff to encourage production of a type of cotton not grown in the United States, and then enact a law limiting the number of acres on which that type of cotton may be grown.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have conferred with the author of the bill who assures me that he has no objection to this amendment. I do not desire to take the time of the Senate in discussing the question, but I ask leave to include in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an extract from a publication issued in 1932 by the Department of Agriculture relative to the production of this type of cotton and of the other long-staple cotton in the United States and the importation of Egyptian cotton. I also desire to print in the RECORD a tabulation showing the comparative price of the American grown, Sakellarides cotton imported from Egypt and certain other data pertinent to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXTRACT FROM SOME PHASES OF THE LONG-STAPLE COTTON SITUATION IN THE UNITED STATES

(By A. M. Agelasto, senior marketing specialist; W. W. Fetrow, senior agricultural economist; and C. C. Farrington, assistant agricultural economist, Division of Cotton Marketing, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Department of Agriculture, July 1932)

AMERICAN-EGYPTIAN (PIMA) COTTON

American-Egyptian is an extra-long-staple cotton ranging in length from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches, the modal length being about $1\frac{9}{16}$ inches. Such cotton is now grown only in irrigated districts of Arizona, although small quantities have been produced in California.

Commercial production of this cotton began about 1911 and increased rapidly to 1920 when about 92,000 bales were produced (table 5). Production then declined rapidly to only 4,374 bales in 1924. The crop averaged about 25,000 bales annually during the 5 years 1926-30. The estimated production for 1931 is 15,000 bales.

Annual consumption of American-Egyptian cotton in the United States has been reported separately since 1919-20. It reached a peak of 65,235 bales in 1922-23 and declined to only 11,740 bales in 1925-26. Consumption of this cotton was 15,359 bales in 1930-31, this being slightly greater than consumption in any of the preceding 3 years, but less than in 1926-27. Monthly consumption of American-Egyptian cotton was at a relatively high level from about January to October 1931, as compared with the same months of other recent years. Domestic consumption of this cotton during the first 6 months of 1931-32 was 7,680 bales, as compared with 6,078 bales in 1930-31 and 7,420 bales in 1929-30.

Small quantities of American-Egyptian cotton were exported in 1929, 1930, and 1931, the only years for which data are available. Of the 4,545 bales exported in 1929, 3,000 bales went to France, 744 to Great Britain, and 521 to Canada.

SEA-ISLAND COTTON

Sea-island cotton ranges in staple from about $1\frac{3}{8}$ inches to 2 inches or longer, and is the longest cotton of commercial importance. Annual production of sea-island cotton in the United States approximated 100,000 running bales (of about 400 pounds each) from about 1895 to 1917, the greatest production being 119,293 bales in 1911. This cotton was produced in South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. Production declined rapidly following 1917, and by 1924 commercial production had practically disappeared. This rapid decline is usually attributed largely to the difficulties of producing sea-island cotton under boll-weevil conditions.

Domestic supplies of sea-island cotton have been augmented during recent years to the extent of several hundred bales annually by cotton produced in Puerto Rico and shipped to the United States. Production of sea-island cotton in Puerto Rico averaged about 1,300 bales (of 500 pounds) annually during the 4 years 1926-27 to 1929-30. A large part of this cotton has been taken by mills of the United States and the remainder has been exported to Europe. Shipments of cotton from Puerto Rico to the United States totaled 2,125 bales during the 12 months ended June 30, 1931, as compared with 1,188 bales in 1930 and 925 bales in 1929.

Consumption of sea-island cotton in the United States averaged about 85,000 bales annually during the 5 years, 1913-14 to 1917-18, but following this period it declined rapidly. The decline was continuous except in 1927-28 and 1930-31, when slight gains were reported. Consumption in 1930-31 was 410 bales, as compared with 372 bales in 1929-30 and 795 bales in 1928-29.

EGYPTIAN COTTON

Egyptian cotton may be divided roughly into two classes, Sakellarides and uppers. Sakellarides constitutes from one fourth to one third of the Egyptian crop and has a staple length ranging from $1\frac{1}{8}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches. From two thirds to three fourths of the Egyptian crop is uppers, the staple length of which ranges from about $1\frac{1}{8}$ inches to $1\frac{3}{8}$ inches. Of the cotton exported from Egypt to the United States during the calendar years 1926 to 1930, 28 percent was Sakellarides, about 70 percent was uppers, and 2 percent was other strains. United States imports of Egyptian cotton averaged approximately 15 percent of the production of cotton in Egypt during the 10-year period 1920-21 to 1929-30.

Imports of Egyptian cotton into the United States averaged about 219,000 bales annually during the 10 years, 1920-21 to 1929-30. These imports fluctuated widely during the period from 1913-14 to 1930-31, the greatest annual importation being 485,000 bales, in 1919-20, and the smallest about 23,000 bales, in 1930-31. The year of large imports, 1919-20, was preceded by 2 years of restricted imports and declining stocks of Egyptian cotton. Following the large importation and increasing stocks of 1919-20, imports of 1920-21 declined to only 87,000 bales. Annual imports of Egyptian cotton were comparatively stable from 1921-22 to 1929-30, but were reduced drastically in 1930-31. The decline in imports during 1930-31 was preceded by large importations and the building up of stocks in April and May 1930. A tariff of 7 cents a pound on cotton having a staple length of $1\frac{1}{8}$ inches and longer became effective in June 1930. The decline in imports since 1929-30 has doubtless been accentuated also by the forces at play in the world-wide business depression. Imports of Egypttian cotton to the United States were 16,654 bales during the first 6 months of 1931-32, as compared with 3,582 bales in 1930-31 and 98,778 bales in 1929-30. Stocks of Egyptian cotton in the United States declined from 155,201 bales on June 30, 1930, to 41,616 bales on January 31, 1932. These January stocks were the smallest end-of-month stocks recorded since April 1919 and the smallest January stocks on record.

Consumption of Egyptian cotton in the United States averaged approximately 216,000 bales annually during the 10 years, 1920-21 to 1929-30, but declined in 1930-31 to 104,095 bales, or to less than 50 percent of this 10-year average. During the period 1913-14 to 1929-30 the largest annual consumption of Egyptian cotton was 323,124 bales, in 1919-20, and the smallest was 126,087 bales, in 1918-19. Consumption of Egyptian cotton declined from a monthly rate of approximately 18,000 bales in April 1930 to less than 6,000 bales in August 1931. During the first 6 months of 1931-32 consumption of Egyptian cotton totaled 39,196 bales, as compared with 51,913 bales for the same period in 1930-31 and 113,761 bales in 1929-30.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, October 21, 1933.

QUESTIONNAIRE ON LONG-STAPLE COTTON OF ARIZONA

- What are the reasons for the decline in production of American-Egyptian (Pima) cotton since the crop of 1929?
- What industries are now the principal consumers of Pima cotton?
- Has there been an important shift in Pima consumption by various industries?
- What grade of Sakellarides affords the fairest price comparison with Pima No. 2?
- Quotations for Pima No. 2 are usually slightly higher than those for duty-paid Sakellarides fully good fair, both delivered New England mill points. Is this due to superiority in grade or staple or to some other reason?
- Is Pima cotton ginned exclusively on roller gins?
- Is any type of American-Egyptian cotton, other than Pima, being grown in commercial quantities?
- What is the average yield per acre of Pima cotton? Of long-staple, upland cotton grown in Arizona?
- We note a slight increase in the production of long-staple upland cotton in Arizona. Has this cotton proved more profitable than Pima to the grower?
- What types of long-staple upland are grown in Arizona?
- What are the fiber characteristics of long-staple uplands grown in Arizona?
- What are the uses of the long-staple upland cotton grown in Arizona?

13. To what extent and in what way, if any, has the duty of 7 cents per pound on long-staple cotton under the Tariff Act of 1930 affected:

(a) The Pima-cotton industry? (b) The long-staple upland industry in Arizona?

ANSWERS

1. The reason for the decline in production of American-Egyptian (Pima) cotton since the crop of 1929 was that previous to the time of the 7-cent tariff a large amount of Egyptian cotton was dumped into this country that was sufficient for the spinners' needs for more than a full year; this so depressed the market demand that the difference in price between Pima and upland cotton was decreased to the detriment of Pima. Also the rate of exchange on the British pound declined to such an extent that the 7-cent tariff was no obstacle to the importation of Egyptian cotton until 1932. Also the world-wide depression naturally curtailed the demand for almost all of the higher-priced commodities in favor of the cheaper ones.

2. Fine-goods spinners use most of the Pima cotton. One of the tire companies also uses it.

3. The shirt companies are beginning to use Pima more extensively.

4. Pima No. 2 is used as a basis. Fully good fair sakel is used as a basis. Fully good fair corresponds with Pima No. 3 in class. There is also a difference in staple, the Pima being longer.

5. This is answered by the above remarks in no. 4.

6. Pima can be and is only ginned on roller gins.

7. There is no American-Egyptian cotton other than Pima being grown commercially.

8. Long-time average yield of Pima is about 250 pounds per acre. The estimated yield of long staple upland in Arizona for this year is 360 pounds.

9. On an average Pima cotton has been more profitable to good growers. Upland has increased on account of the ability of the cotton finance people to hedge it on the open market and protect themselves, and due to economic conditions most of the growers require financing.

10. Acala is the type of long-staple upland cotton grown in Arizona.

11. One and one sixteenth to one and one eighth inch marks the Arizona long-staple upland cotton.

12. Much of the long-staple cotton from Arizona is exported to Japan.

13. (a) The beneficial effect of the tariff has only started to be felt in the sale of the present crop due to the conditions as explained in no. 1. (b) No effect.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., March 8, 1934.

Senator CARL HAYDEN,
Washington, D.C.:

Cotton farmers in State insist on some form of compulsory cotton control, such as the Bankhead bill. Bankhead bill should protect those farmers who have executed a 1934 cotton acreage-reduction contract. Place a ginning tax of at least 75 percent of the prevailing price of cotton when offered to be ginned on those farms who do not cooperate in the 1934 program. Please furnish copies to Ashurst, Greenway, Secretary Wallace, and Cobb.

SAM S. WALLACE,
President Arizona Farm Bureau.

UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA, COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE AND AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Tucson, March 6, 1934.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HAYDEN: I have just read a copy of the Bankhead bill. I do not know the status of the bill; possibly it has already passed Congress. If not, can it not be amended so as to exclude cotton the lint of which is over 1½ inches in length, at least until the production of such cotton reaches 60,000 bales, which is approximately the amount of long-staple cotton imported each year from Egypt? The production of Pima cotton last year was only 12,000 bales, and the year before it was 8,000 bales.

I have talked long and earnestly in various sections of the State in the effort to get farmers to plant Pima instead of upland cotton.

Very truly yours,

G. E. P. SMITH,
Irrigation Engineer.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Every increased bale of that type of cotton grown will displace under this bill a bale of some other cotton, will it not?

Mr. HAYDEN. In Arizona and southern California there is a certain acreage which may be planted to long-staple cotton or short-staple cotton. My amendment will take out of cultivation an acre of short-staple cotton every time an acre of long-staple cotton is planted, and that is exactly the tendency the bill seeks to foster.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I do not think the Senate understands exactly the situation. This type of cotton really is not counted in the ordinary upland cotton for which we receive quotations.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. It is in a special class to itself, of which we never produced any until the introduction of Egyptian seed several years ago in the Imperial Valley and in certain parts of Arizona.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. REED. Under the scheme which has been in force during the past year whereby cotton growers are being paid for not working, did the growers of the long-staple cotton receive those bounties?

Mr. HAYDEN. I imagine that when the acreage-reduction campaign was inaugurated those in authority simply said, "A bale of cotton is a bale of cotton, and all ought to be treated alike." It was a mistake if that was done, for clearly we ought not to remove from cultivation an acre producing this kind of cotton in the United States merely to allow another acre in Egypt to be grown to the same kind of cotton, because we must have the cotton, as shown by the imports, which are three times as great as the quantity of long-staple cotton produced in the United States.

Mr. REED. Of course, I think most people expect the acreage of cotton in India and Egypt to be very much increased as a result of the enactment of this bill. We are deliberately throwing away a share of the world's market for cotton. More Egyptian cotton is going to be sold in Liverpool than heretofore and less American cotton; and we are doing all that in the name of conferring a benefit on the American cotton grower.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is talking to the merits of the bill itself. My amendment merely exempts from the operation of the bill a type of cotton which we must import.

Mr. REED. I was hoping that the Senator from Arizona or the Senator from South Carolina could tell us whether the long-staple-cotton growers in Arizona have been getting bounties for reducing their acreage.

Mr. SMITH. I am not advised as to that, but, if the Senator from Arizona will allow me, as he has well pointed out, previous to the operation of the tariff law, there were imported into this country tremendous quantities of Egyptian cotton, which is in a class to itself. It does not enter into any of the ordinary commercial forms. There have to be special looms, special cards, and special machinery for handling it. Up to a few years ago it was largely used in the manufacture of automobile tires on account of the long staple and its strength.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to say that we cannot use long-staple cotton in everything for which we use the short staple, does he?

Mr. SMITH. We cannot do so because the looms and the cards are not set for it. It is not of the nature of the other cotton at all.

Mr. LONG. The looms and cards could be reset.

Mr. SMITH. We imported one year several million bales of Indian cotton because it was cheap, and it nearly ruined every mill and every card in which it was used, not only on account of the length of the staple, which was not in excess of 1 inch in length, but on account of the character of the product itself. It has not the tensile strength or the character of the American cotton. The cards are set and the looms are prepared in the same way for the long-staple cotton. The fact of the matter is that the length, as indicated by the Senator from Arizona, does not enter into our ordinary manufactures. It is used for the purpose of lace curtains and some of it of an especially fine character is used for cotton thread. The major part of it has been used up until now in the manufacture of composites such as automobile tires, the webbing that goes inside of an automobile tire, and for other very necessary strong cordage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arizona on the amendment has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] will advise the Senate that he approves the amendment I think the matter can be brought to a vote.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to the amendment. The amount of cotton involved is small.

Mr. LONG. It could not possibly involve any large amount of cotton?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram which I have been requested to have read to the Senate. It is from the editor of the publication to which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] this morning referred, Mr. Poe, of the Progressive Farmer. I ask that the telegram be read in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

RALEIGH, N.C., March 27, 1934.

Senator E. D. SMITH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Agriculture,
Washington, D.C.:

I heartily agree with any Senators who say the United States Government should not of itself tell a farmer how much cotton he should grow. But I just as heartily disagree with any Senators who would prevent a clear majority of farmers after full deliberation from deciding to protect their own families, their homes, and their living standards by limiting production to a quantity that will avoid the heretofore ever-present danger of starvation prices. In no other way can millions of scattered farmers exercise the same right of financial self-preservation, which manufacturers constantly and freely exercise through having only a few vast units to deal with. My recollection is that when depression came steel manufacturers cut production to less than 20 percent of normal, whereas when cotton prices drop hosts of growers in the desperate effort to find enough money to live on actually increase production and thus intensify their own disaster. It may be too late this year to have producers actually vote on the Bankhead bill in community meetings after hearing all phases fully discussed, but this plan should at least be insured for future years and the Bankhead bill then passed. Its defeat would bring a collapse in cotton prices and disaster to the South. Believing as I do, that I thus voice the earnest desires of the vast majority of southern cotton growers, I hope you will read this telegram in the Senate.

CLARENCE POE,
Editor Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate to comment on the telegram. What Mr. Poe suggests is that after the bill shall have been tried we should then submit it to a vote of the farmers. The farmers have already in effect reached the conclusion that Mr. Poe reaches, that they must be protected from another disastrously large production.

Let me say a word with reference to what was said this morning by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and others to the effect that we are denying the small farmer the right to make cotton enough to give him a living. The very smallest cotton farmer has reduced his acreage because he gets from the Government 4 cents a pound on the average for what he would have produced on that land taken out of production had he planted it, so that he gets $20 a bale net profit without any effort on his part as an inducement from the Government for him to enter into this agreement and to allow the Government to put him and those like him all in the same category.

I have been astounded to hear those opposing the measure claim that it is going to work havoc to the small farmer, when, as a matter of fact, it will be the very salvation of the small farmer, as well as giving a splendid profit to the big farmer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator mentioned the fact that the small farmer will get 4 cents a pound. I do not quite understand the mechanics by which he is to be paid the 4 cents so he will get $20 a bale.

Mr. SMITH. Suppose he had 10 acres in cotton and made half a bale to the acre. He reduces his acreage by 4 acres. He would then have two bales of cotton cut out of his production. The Government says, "You averaged, over 5 years, half a bale of cotton to the acre. As rental for that land we will give you 4 cents a pound for the average production you have made over a period of 5 years." Therefore, he gets $20 a bale, a commercial bale being 500 pounds, which would give him $20 for the rent of that 4 acres which he has taken out of production. It is a notorious fact that heretofore he has not made very much out of his cotton, but under the reduced acreage he will make more on what he does plant and, together with that, he has a guarantee of $20 a bale for what he does not plant.

Mr. KING. Then the rent is paid by the increased price of the commodity sold rather than by a direct profit from the processor?

Mr. SMITH. No; this is provided for out of the processing tax.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina where the Government gets the money which it pays in this way?

Mr. SMITH. Out of the processing tax from the manufacturer.

Mr. GLASS. Where does the manufacturer get the processing tax?

Mr. SMITH. Out of the Senator from Virginia et al. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. In other words, he gets it out of the millions of people who are compelled to use cotton goods and the many millions who cannot afford to use any other kind of goods. Nobody ever rises here and speaks a word for the consumer. In other words, it is proposed to take the money of the consumer in order to make the consumer pay more for his cotton goods.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and I think there is some room for doing it when we remember that we pay $2.50 for 5 ounces of the simplest weave known to the manufacturer in the form of the shirt that goes on our back. We pay $2.50 for 5 ounces, and that is at the rate of about $7 or $8 a pound for the cotton that goes into a shirt. The man who makes that cotton gets 5 cents a pound. There is some room there for something to be done.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. How has the Government come out financially in the matter of the processing tax under the Agricultural Adjustment Act? The administration is three or four hundred million dollars in the hole, is it not?

Mr. SMITH. Not according to their statement. I am not a proponent of that act and I am not going to get into an argument over the processing tax.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 7, line 24, section 5 (a), strike out the word "five" and insert the word "ten", so as to read:

When an allotment is made, in order to prevent unfair competition and unfair trade practices in marketing cotton in the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion to the several cotton-producing States the number of bales the marketing of which may be exempt from the tax herein levied, which shall be determined by the ratio of the average number of bales produced in each State during the 10 crop years preceding the passage of this act.

And so forth.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the language referred to by the amendment will be found on page 7 of the bill in section 5 (a). The effect of my amendment will be to make the base 10 crop years instead of 5. Why? The Atlantic seaboard of the Cotton Belt has been reducing its acreage over the past several years. That portion of the Cotton Belt west of the Mississippi—Texas, Oklahoma, and Arkansas—have been expanding their production; and it will be very unfair to place the allotment for the States on the Atlantic seaboard on a 5-year basis. In order that it may be just, we ought to find the average over the 10-year period, and it is for that reason that I am offering this amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator mean to say that Texas is increasing its acreage, while North Carolina and these other States have been decreasing theirs?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand that the Senator from North Carolina has not yielded the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. DICKINSON. Speaking about the processing tax, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] said that no one had spoken with reference to the consumer. In the few remarks I made here a while ago I showed that the processing tax, according to the Treasury report, up to March 22 had amounted to $235,476,841.86, and that the estimate of the Department of Agriculture with reference to the expenditures was $855,000,000 up to July 1. There is every indication that the processing tax is not bringing in more than about 30 to 40 percent of the revenue that is going to be necessary to carry on this program. I also suggested, just as the Senator from Virginia has suggested, that when the processing tax is imposed the consumption is decreased by increasing the price, and therefore the whole system deadlocks itself; and next year, by reason of lower consumption, resulting from higher prices, we shall have to make an additional curtailment of acreage, take more land out of cultivation, or absorb more cotton by reason of tax imposition, as proposed in this bill. In other words, it is a system that simply deadlocks itself before we get around to the point of beginning to benefit.

Let me suggest further that we have been talking here about the processing tax and its effect on commodities. The processing tax on hogs was imposed at a very light rate, 50 cents per hundred. In the beginning it was all taken out of the producer. The price of hogs went down low; and were it not for the fact that the Department of Agriculture is now buying some fifteen to twenty-five thousand head of hogs almost daily to feed people through the emergency relief organizations the price of hogs, in my judgment, would be exceptionally low, and the sale of hogs from the farms of the State of Iowa would be almost impossible.

The same thing is going to happen with reference to cattle, although the price of cattle is exceedingly low right now. Therefore we are taking a step here that in the very nature of the program will defeat itself, and yet we are spending millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in order to try out this experiment.

It is very easy to say here, as was said yesterday, "Every cotton producer knows that it costs him 12 to 14 cents a pound, on the average, to raise cotton in the South." What occurred? Cotton went up to 10 cents a pound. Why did it go up? It went up because, as has been shown by the Treasury report here, the dollar was devaluated. An inflation program was put into operation whereby there was added to the Treasury balance, by that one bookkeeping item alone, $2,807,673,007.61. That meant that the price of gold had to be increased in this country, and by reason of the increase in the price of gold and the resulting devaluation of the dollar the foreign countries could buy more cotton in this country; and now it is said that this was one of the simple hocus-pocus operations whereby the Government, having so much cotton, could say to the farmer, "If you reduce your acreage, we will turn over to you, at so much a pound, a certain amount of the cotton that we have in storage."

But where did the Government get the cotton? Why, the last report on the Agricultural Adjustment Act—and every Senator ought to read it, as I said this morning—shows, on page 33, that—

As the matter stood, on January 1, 1934, the Secretary of Agriculture had acquired 1,800,000 bales of actual cotton of varying net weight—the equivalent of 1,869,000 bales of 500-pound weight—and 618,300 bales of futures contracts. Except for final formalities, this completed the acquisition of cotton from the Farm Credit Administration—

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I was yielding to the Senator, but I did not wish to yield the entire 15 minutes.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Iowa is occupying the floor in his own right.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator is speaking in his own time, very well.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am speaking in my own time.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. Then I will take my seat and ask for recognition later.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is my understanding, that I am speaking in my own 15 minutes on this amendment.

Except for final formalities, this completed the acquisition of cotton from the Farm Credit Administration and made available a total of 2,487,300 bales for meeting the options held by cotton growers.

We would think from the report and from what has been said on the floor of the Senate that this is not costing anybody anything. Why, yes; it was the taxpayers' money that bought this cotton in the first place. It is not gratis cotton. Nobody gave that cotton to the Administration. It was bought with the taxpayers' money; and instead of realizing and trying to protect the taxpayers on the price of this cotton that is now held, under this splendid scheme of hocus-pocus we turn it back to a fellow down there for sitting on the fence post, letting his land lie idle, and say to him that in addition to the cotton he already has we are giving him $20 a bale of the taxpayers' money in order to make him feel good. That is the result of this proposal, and yet the Senate is asked to vote a continuation of that type of program from this day on at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do.

Mr. CLARK. Has the Senator the figures on the amount of money that was lost in the cotton speculations under the Hoover Farm Board?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not know anything about that. I know there was a loss of $100,000,000 or so; but I desire to suggest to the Senator that the amount lost by the Federal Farm Board under President Hoover is mere pocket change in comparison with what will be lost and is being lost under this type of program. Why? According to the figures of the Senator's own administration, $855,000,000 is involved in this thing now, and only $235,000,000 has been returned.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield further, the report of the Federal Farm Board under the Hoover administration showed that they lost almost half a billion dollars gambling in cotton.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no; they never had more than one appropriation, and that was $500,000,000.

Mr. CLARK. And they lost most of that gambling in cotton.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no. As a matter of fact, what happened under the Federal Farm Board was that we lost about $270,000,000 in both wheat and cotton, but we are going to lose that here now. In fact, we have already lost it; and we are going to lose a great deal more with it because of the type of program that is being carried on here. The sum of $833,000,000 is estimated now to carry on the Agricultural Adjustment Act for 1935. Those figures are in the report here. This report lists every commodity for 1934 and 1935. The Government officials do not estimate that they are going to be able to make this thing balance. They estimate a loss in this very report; and that is part of this splendid economic planning for the future that is going to put the farmer on easy street.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, as the Senator from Iowa well knows, I was not in favor of the Agricultural Adjustment Act in the first place, and voted against it.

Mr. DICKINSON. So did I.

Mr. CLARK. But, it seems to me, the Senator from Iowa is in very poor case to be protesting at this late date against Government interference in business, because he not only voted for the Hoover Farm Board but he turned up as Chairman of the Republican National Convention and key-note for the Republican Party in 1932, lauding the loss of half a billion dollars by the Federal Farm Board as one of the great achievements of the Hoover administration.

Mr. DICKINSON. Permit me to say that I always frankly admitted the loss, and I have also said that the Government ought to get out of speculation; that we had had an experiment, and that experiment ought to have been enough to give a little bit of caution to the Democratic administration not only not to repeat the experiment but not to make it a good deal worse than that experiment; and that is what is being done in this bill. Yet the Democrats, regardless of all the faults of the Republican administration, seem to be willing not only to repeat its faults but to go it many, many, many times better.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. So far as I am concerned, I profited from the parlor lessons that were taught the American people by the Hoover administration. I am going to vote against this bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. So am I.

Mr. CLARK. But the Senator from Iowa has for years been in the position of lauding every mistake the Hoover administration made and criticizing every experiment of any sort that the Democratic administration could undertake.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest there that I never lauded the mistakes of the Hoover administration. They had a program that might have worked out, and it seemed to be the most expedient thing that we had at that time. It was a mistake; and instead of acknowledging the mistake they simply went the other way, and the Democrats have tried not only to duplicate that mistake but to make it a hundred times worse.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I desire to say that the Senator has no complaint of the Democratic administration, because Mr. Hoover recommended plowing up this acreage. We all gave him the ha-ha, and now we have come along and done it; so that ought to make the Senator more with us than ever.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. We have not changed any. We just took Hoover's policy that he could not put over when he was in power himself and have gone and done it.

Mr. DICKINSON. And made it worse.

Mr. LONG. No; we made it just what he wanted.

Mr. DICKINSON. I read into the Record this morning the statement of President Hoover—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. CLARK. I call for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Beginning on page 2, line 17, following the figure "1936", it is proposed to strike out the remainder of line 17 and all the rest of the paragraph, in the following words:

But if the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing will continue or is likely to continue to exist so that the application of this act with respect to the crop year 1936-37 is imperative in order to carry out the policy declared in section 1, he shall so proclaim, and this act shall be effective with respect to the crop year 1936-37. If at any time prior to the end of the crop year 1936-37, the President finds that the economic emergency in cotton production and marketing has ceased to exist, he shall so proclaim, and no tax under this act shall be levied with respect to cotton harvested after the effective date of such proclamation.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the President from having optional authority to extend the workings of this legislation for any time beyond 1936. In other words, I am opposed to having this transfer of Executive authority to do any of these things extended.

We have had a great deal of this kind of limitation in connection with practically every piece of legislation that has been before us in the Seventy-third Congress. The purpose of the amendment is to have Congress say that this legislation is definite up to the year 1936, and then nobody shall have authority to extend it.

Mr. President, let me explain why I offer the amendment. Congress will be in session in 1936, if there is any Congress left. Some people say there is not going to be any.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I respectfully wish to inquire whether the Senator will not accept an amendment I desire to offer as a substitute, in line 16, on page 2, after the figures "1935", to insert a period and to strike out the remainder of section 2.

Mr. DICKINSON. I accept that as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa modifies his amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, that would shorten the time of the operation of the measure and make it end in 1935, as I understand.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. I was just suggesting that there should not be any optional provision here for power to be exercised by the President, because Congress will have to be in session. If Congress likes the law, Congress may extend it for a year; but it is my judgment that Congress will be so ashamed of it that it will not want to extend it a year. In other words, I think Congress will be very glad to have the statute of limitations run so far as this legislation is concerned.

Mr. President, in order that we may understand this a little more fully, I wish to quote from Mark Sullivan's article in the New York Herald Tribune of Monday, March 26, the following:

Mr. Roosevelt when he became President put into effect a farm plan which conformed to this voluntary principle. Less than a year later the voluntary plan has failed, and the President has endorsed a compulsory plan under which each raiser of cotton must get a license from the Government and is permitted to raise only so much as the Government dictates, under penalty of suffering a confiscatory tax on each additional bale. The compulsion now put upon cotton raisers will in due course be put upon all farmers of all other crops, from wheat to peanuts.

I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that he includes peanuts. I understand that the conference report on the bill for the extension of the Agricultural Adjustment Act retains in the bill peanuts and the other agricultural commodities, including cattle, and so forth. Therefore, the word "peanuts" should remain here. I continue reading:

And this second step, which is compulsory limitation, will be followed by other steps, including, at probably an early date, price-fixing. The logical last step, fantastic to suggest now, but inherently inevitable unless the process is arrested, would be the raising of all crops on great Government-owned farms. One feels that Mr. Roosevelt himself could not have foreseen the sequence of inevitability in which he is now involved, but one wonders very much whether some of the radicals, intent on revolution, did not see it.

The evidences of authenticity in Dr. Wirt's letter are many. He quotes his informants among the radicals in the administration as having told him that "they believed that by thwarting our * * * recovery they would be able to prolong the country's destitution until they had demonstrated to the American people that the Government must operate industry and commerce."

It is a fact that several of the measures emanating from the radicals have had the effect of slowing up recovery. This could hardly be without design on the part of the framers of these measures.

What I want to suggest is that we are slowing up recovery. Every time we involve an industry in this type of governmental bureaucratic control, we slow up recovery. Therefore, if this bill must pass, it ought to pass with a limitation, making the time as short as possible, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. For that reason I am in thorough accord with his suggestion that we limit the period to a much shorter time.

Mr. President, following this suggestion I wish to read from the magazine Time, in the issue dated February 6, 1934, with reference to the new dealers, with reference to who draws the legislation we are enacting, with reference to the source of the legislation, with reference to who it is that is formulating all this series of laws, and imposing them upon Congress.

It is already suggested that we do not need to hold a session of Congress next year, that there is no use of our assembling. I do not know whether or not we are ready to go to that extent. I think it was Hitler who said he did not need a Reichstag any longer. He just sent them home for 4 years. Perhaps we ought to be sent home, and if we sit here as dumb as we have been in the past I do not know but that we should be sent home. So I shall read to the Senate from Time:

Many another new dealer chimed in his suggestion. Even such articulate liberals as John Flynn and Max Lowenthal had their say. Most of the actual drafting was done by shy Benjamin Victor Cohen, of P.W.A.'s railway division, and Thomas Corcoran, R.F.C. counsel. Lawyer Corcoran used to work in the Manhattan legal firm of Cotton, Franklin, Wright & Gordon. Lawyer Cohen is a protégé of Felix Frankfurter. Both are young, brilliant, determined. Both live with a half dozen other new dealers in Bachelor Hall, a large, comfortable house in Georgetown. There they all share a housekeeping butler and liberal ideal, live on $50 per month each. Lawyers Cohen and Corcoran are typical of the host of radical young lawyers in Washington who keep well in the background while they fabricate the advanced measures Congress is supposed to pass without reading.

Mr. President, I ask that I be permitted to include in my remarks a list of the professors who have been brought into public service as it is found in the Washington Post of this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 27, 1934]

PROFESSORS GET THE FIRST CALL IN NEW DEAL—MORE THAN 200 COLLEGE EDUCATORS HOLD POSTS IN DEPARTMENTS

The men known popularly as "President Roosevelt's 'brain trust'" occupy positions of importance in many departments of the Federal Government.

More than 200 college professors accepted jobs with the administration during its first year.

Best known of the Presidential advisers, perhaps, are Dr. Rexford G. Tugwell, assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture; Prof. George Frederick Warren, of Cornell, who helped work out the Roosevelt monetary policies; and Prof. James Harvey Rogers, of Yale, who just has been ordered to China to look into the world silver situation.

Almost as often on the public tongue are the names of Francis B. Sayre, formerly of the Harvard Law School, who is Assistant Secretary of State.

Dr. Raymond A. Moley, former Columbia professor, who worked with Mr. Roosevelt during the campaign and the early months of his administration, no longer is in a Government position.

EZEKIEL A. HOLDOVER

Dr. Mordecai Ezekiel, an adviser to Secretary Wallace who frequently is listed among the professional advisers, came into the Department in preceding administrations and has been an employee there for many years.

Two of the three directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority—Dr. Arthur E. Morgan and Dr. Harcourt A. Morgan—are former college presidents.

The newest member of the Interstate Commerce Commission is Dr. Walter M. W. Splawn, formerly president of the Baylor University, Tex.

Leon Henderson, chairman of the N.R.A. Research and Planning Board, formerly was with Carnegie Tech and the Russell Sage Foundation. Another former professor, Charles W. Elliot, 2d, who used to be on the Harvard faculty, is executive secretary of the planning board.

Roswell Magill, of Columbia, is income-tax adviser to the Treasury and did much of the Department's work before congressional committees this year. Adolph Augustus Berle, Jr., of Columbia, adviser at different times to the Treasury, the Reconstruction Corporation, and the Agricultural Department, now is assisting Mayor Fiorella LaGuardia of New York.

STILL MORE PROFESSORS

A far from complete list of the professors in the Roosevelt administration also would include:

H. M. Waite, a lecturer at engineering schools, now deputy Public Works administrator.

Maj. Philip B. Fleming, former football coach and instructor in military engineering at West Point, executive officer in the P.W.A.

Dr. Clark Foreman, of Atlanta, in charge of the Interior Department's investigation into the economic status of the Negro, has as his aid Dr. Robert C. Weaver, formerly at the North Carolina Agricultural and Technical College.

Leo Wolman, of Columbia University, chairman of N.R.A.'s labor advisory board.

Lewis W. Douglas, Director of the Budget, who taught at Amherst and was a Representative from Arizona before his present appointment.

Prof. Lindsay Rogers of Columbia, P.W.A. member of the Board of Labor Review.

Dr. Leon Marshall, of Johns Hopkins University, vice chairman of the National Labor Board.

ONE AN AMBASSADOR

William E. Dodd, of the University of Chicago, Ambassador to Germany.

Dr. Jacob Viner, of the University of Chicago, recently appointed special adviser to Secretary Morgenthau.

Dr. Earl Dean Howard, of Northwestern, author of The Socratic Method of Developing Intelligence; N.R.A. deputy administrator for the garment industry.

Paul H. Douglas, of the University of Chicago, member of the Consumers' Advisory Board.

Emil Hurja, one time instructor at the University of Washington, who resigned recently as administrative assistant of Public Works to accept a post with the Democratic National Committee.

M. W. Strauss, one time teacher of journalism at Northwestern, Public Works publicity director.

Dr. Charles E. Merriam, of the University of Chicago, member of the National Planning Board.

Almost the entire American delegation to the International Institute of Statistics at Mexico City was composed of professors.

The National Recovery Administration has 59 professors on its staff, and the Agriculture Department 56.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, in order to limit the operations of the proposed law, if we must have this nostrum imposed upon the farmers of the country in order to relieve them of their misery at as early a date as possible, I hope this amendment may be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, legislation of the character now under consideration might possibly be justified were we at war. It has been said, though I shall not quote the Latin maxim, that in the presence of war, laws are silent. So when our country is at war, perhaps where its life may be in jeopardy, we may be required to subordinate our personal views and to support measures which are considered necessary to the welfare of our country.

No such emergency exists today as to warrant the invocation of the principle to which I have adverted, and no such condition exists as to warrant the enactment of this most extraordinary and remarkable measure now before us.

Mr. President, we appreciate that some of the measures which have been under consideration during the past year were experimental. Some believed that they were unnecessary and would result in harm. Therefore we placed limitations on a number of these important measures, limiting their life to 2 years. Some measures, as I recall, were subjected to a limitation of 1 year.

I am opposed to extending the life of this measure at the discretion of the President. The measure is bad enough, to be foisted upon the people for a period of 1 or 2 years, but I protest against an enlargement of the time during which it may have life.

Mr. President, reference was made a few moments ago to the farm bill enacted under the administration of Mr. Hoover. I think most Democrats voted against that bill. They said that it was a rash experiment, that it would fail to produce the results predicted, and that it would eventually result in the waste of the larger part of the $500,000,000 appropriated.

We frequently called attention to the prophecies made and to their fulfillment. That was an experiment, dangerous in character, and constituted a precedent which has been relied upon in support of measures which have been introduced since then.

One bad precedent, Mr. President, may poison the stream of legislation or of court decisions, for that matter, that may follow.

I cannot quite understand how Senators on this side of the Chamber, in view of that experiment which was so disastrous, can support the measure now before us. There is a parallel between them, although the farm bill was less objectionable than the measure now before us.

Mr. President, if the pending bill shall pass I see no restrictions that Congress may impose upon individual liberty, with the rights of individuals to pursue their life unmolested, even though they are not interfering with the rights of others. If we may restrict and interfere with individuals as this bill restricts, it is difficult to see what activities may not be controlled by governmental agencies.

This bill superimposes on the individual autocratic power, unlimited, and the result of which inevitably will be to deter individuals from the prosecution of the pursuits in which they are engaged, even though in so doing they are not interfering with or abridging the rights of others. Even if some persons desire to be controlled by a hateful bureaucracy, even to be regimented in every activity of life, it does not follow that such a course would be right or the results advantageous. Such policies are bound to abridge the rights of minorities and to constitute assaults upon constitutional government.

Pretty soon, Mr. President, we will have no democratic form of government. We shall be regimented in our thoughts and in our activities, until men who desire to be Democrats and to preserve democratic institutions will find themselves in fields that are strange and in paths that insure no safety.

Our Republican friends present no safe course or policies which promise satisfactory results.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator from Utah think that if a prohibition law of this kind can be enforced, that the country retreated too soon and surrendered too soon with regard to the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think perhaps the question answers itself, but at any rate the learned Senator from Oklahoma, with such wise statesmanship as he has exhibited so often, is able to answer that better than I can.

Mr. GORE. This legislation is undertaking to prevent people from doing things that are not malum in se, or any other kind of evil.

Mr. KING. That is right.

Mr. GORE. There was a great moral experiment back of the eighteenth amendment in which there was an attempt to prohibit people from doing things that were injurious.

Mr. KING. I suppose, Mr. President, that the die is cast and that the measure will receive the approval of the Senate. I do not intend to analyze the bill. I rose only to state that it is repugnant to my views, it is hostile to my conceptions of democracy, it is in violation of the letter and the spirit of our Constitution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know nothing about growing cotton. Of course, I am utterly unqualified to speak about the practical application of the bill; but, as an uninformed observer, I find it a little difficult to know how any farmer will be able to determine at the beginning of the season how many acres to plant in order to come out at the end of the season with the number of bales of cotton allowed to him. The bill calls on the farmer to foretell the amount of rain, the amount of sunshine, and the number of boll weevils with which he will have to deal in the course of the growing season.

I should think, then, that the natural thing would be for the farmer to plant a rather considerable acreage in order to be sure to come up to his quota, and in practically every case he will then find that he has grown more cotton than the bill will permit him to sell. He will be penalized by the confiscation of three fourths of his property, if he sells that excess and if the Government catches him at it.

There we have a new kind of prohibition law, in which it is made almost a crime to have a desirable and legitimate commodity raised by the sweat of a citizen's brow. It is made a crime for him to transport it across the State line.

Mr. GORE. A contraband of commerce.

Mr. REED. It becomes a contraband of commerce, as the Senator from Oklahoma so well suggests; and if I am any kind of a prophet and if I understand the American character, we shall see such resentment against the imposition of the requirements contained in the bill that it will take the whole American Army to enforce its provisions.

Mr. GORE. They will not have enough gun cotton to do it.

Mr. REED. And the South, which suffered so cruelly in reconstruction days from the presence of northern troops, will find its very life regulated by an army of Federal enforcement agents, probably backed up by military authority, in the effort to enforce such a law.

As I said, I know nothing of cotton, but I do know something about human nature; and I venture to say that before long the farmer's friends who drafted the bill and are pressing for its passage will be placed on the defensive by every cotton grower in the South—not only by the majority which would vote to restrict production by this pooling method, not only by the minority that will vote against it, but by all of them.

We shall find this measure most intensely resented by the very people we are trying to benefit, just as today the processing taxes are nowhere more unpopular in my State than among the very farmers whom they are supposed to benefit. Even the consumers whose cost of living has been unfairly raised do not resent this tax so much as the farmers who produce the commodities which are subject to the tax. So it will be with respect to this measure. So it will be, in the long run, with every one of the many efforts we make to repeal the law of supply and demand.

In the 11 years I have been in the Senate there has not been a single session in which someone, in the name of saving the farmer, has not come in here with some kind of device to repeal the economic laws that affect the farmer, as they affect every one of us. Every such device has been a failure, and every one of them will be a failure. There are some things which it is beyond the power of government to change.

That, however, is not the matter that concerns me so much about this bill. That which concerns me is the invasion of individual liberty which it sanctions; the subjection of the citizen to the control of a bureaucratic authority whom he never sees and does not know, and who does not hear his case; the subjection of the livelihood of a vast throng of American citizens to the arbitrary, despotic control of somebody here in Washington for whom they never voted, and for whom they never will get a chance to vote.

We here in the national legislature are responsible to our people for what we do; but who knows the name of the man who will determine John Jones' quota of cotton for next year? He is not elected by anybody. He is not even appointed under the civil service law. He may be, and undoubtedly will be, a person of political authority in the State.

Think, Mr. President, what tremendous political power we are putting into the hands of the men who will fix the quotas of the individual farmers throughout the Southern States! How can anybody defy a politician who is backed up with such power as that? Let me designate the man who can tell everyone in Pennsylvania how long he shall work, how much he shall produce, and in the end what he shall sell his products for, and I ask no finer political machine than that. No one would dare to flaunt the desire of a politician vested with such power. I cannot understand why my colleagues here from the Southern States are willing to saddle upon themselves and their fellow southerners such an arbitrary, despotic, and irresistible political power as this bill confers.

There is no use in talking about the Constitution any more. Our Constitution, like our currency, has been rubberized; but all of us have sworn to support and defend it. Where in the Constitution do we find any power in the Federal Government to regulate commerce between the separate counties of an individual State? And yet this bill pretends to do just that; it makes it a crime to transfer this contraband cotton from one county into any other county. We are a Government of delegated powers, and I defy any of us to point to a line in the Constitution where there is delegated to us any such power as that. Even if it has become rubberized, there are some traces left of our Constitution, and we who are sworn to support and defend it ought to be able to find some charter for the exercise of the power which we assert in passing this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], as modified.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is, as modified by my amendment in the nature of a substitute, as I understand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks in regard to the change I have suggested by way of an amendment that the bill be limited to a period of duration of 1 year.

We have no idea, according to present indications, what the situation in this country is going to be a year from now. As a matter of fact, if today there were a sufficient amount of currency in this country, if there were a sufficient amount of money in the hands of the American people, there being from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and thirty million of them, such legislation as this would not be necessary. It is perhaps at this time necessary; and I shall say it is certainly true that at this time we have a tremendous surplus of cotton because the American people have not the money with which to make purchases of the surplus cotton that could be used in the manufacture of clothing and other cotton goods.

Mr. President, I have been informed by those who are sponsoring this piece of legislation that the great majority of the cotton farmers, at least 75 percent of them, are greatly interested in the passage of this bill. I am desirous of being advised by the farmers, because they know more about their business than I know about it. I am very happy, indeed, to be informed by Senators from the cotton States, who are experts upon the situation, and I shall say here that I expect to vote for the bill; but I know that this proposed legislation is advanced simply because the people of the United States have not sufficient money with which to buy the surplus cotton and surplus wheat and surplus corn and surplus of other commodities.

When we begin to limit the production of cotton or corn or tobacco, we are then beginning to tell the farmers of the United States, and all those who earn their livelihood by the sweat of their brows by the tilling of the soil, that they may work only a certain part of their time; that they may till only a certain portion of their soil. I, Mr. President, cannot understand why the farmers of our country are desirous of placing upon themselves a rule whereby they will not be permitted to work more than a certain number of hours or to till more than a certain number of acres of their land; but it has been said, I repeat, by those who are sponsoring this legislation, that 75 percent of the farmers of the cotton-growing States of the Union are extremely anxious for its passage.

Mr. President, I want to say here and now, in passing, that I believe that this body would do well to limit the provisions of this proposed act for the period of duration of 1 year, and particularly so since I believe that within a year's time there will be a great deal more money in circulation than there now is; and if there shall be more money in circulation then than at the present hour we shall not be called upon to limit production of any product, be it cotton, corn, wheat, or tobacco.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I know my friend believes in the Constitution and the rights of the minority. I wonder if under our constitutions, the constitution of the Senator's own State as well as other States, and the Constitution of the United States, he is willing to announce as a formula to govern our conduct here that the majority may take away the rights of the minority and impose upon them their will, whether it be a majority of 75 percent of the farmers or 75 percent of the lawyers or 75 percent of the members of any other profession? It seems to me that the rights of the minority are just as sacred as are the rights of the majority, and we ought not to transgress them.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I quite agree with the Senator from Utah. The rights of the minority should be respected; but I want to say again that within 1 year from now—if we shall pay to the soldiers of this country the $2,200,000,000 that is due them, thereby making distribution of more currency to the people of this land—if within a year from now we shall issue currency upon silver as a base, thereby placing more money in the hands of the people and providing them with more purchasing power, the enactment of this legislation or the enactment of similar legislation will not be necessary. Therefore, Mr. President, I urge upon this body that the provisions of this measure be limited to a period of duration of 1 year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], as modified.

CHARGES OF DR. WIRT

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask the clerk to read, in my time, an additional statement with reference to Dr. Wirt, of Indiana; also his original statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Mar. 27, 1934]

Dr. Wirt said that he made a series of trips to Washington last year to study governmental methods, and that it was then that he learned of the purported plot to supplant President Roosevelt with a dictator. The plan, he said, as disclosed by a member or members of the "brain trust", was well defined. Under it, he said, the return of prosperity would be deliberately delayed in order to make the public dissatisfied and foment revolution.

SEES CONGRESS LOSING POWER

"I decided", he said, "that the public should be forewarned. If the plan should go through, the election of Congressmen would become a mere formality. If certain new-deal legislation is adopted, the next Congress will be little more than a figurehead."

"Recently at the code hearings the administration unmistakably indicated that this danger is not a theoretical one, and during the next 2 months legislation probably will be passed which will make our elected Congressmen absolutely unimportant. It will make no matter who the people elect and Congress will be helpless."

[From the New York Times, Mar. 24, 1934]

DR. WIRT'S STATEMENT ON "BRAIN TRUST" PLANS

WASHINGTON, March 23.—Following is the text of the statement on the "brain trusters" by Dr. William A. Wirt, of Gary, Ind., founder of the Gary school system, read into the records of the House Interstate Commerce Committee today by James H. Rand, Jr.:

"This manuscript has not been written for publication. I merely want to make the material herein presented available to a few friends in the hope that it may be of help to them in their own writing. You are welcome to use any or all of it in any way that you see fit.

"The fundamental trouble with the 'brain trusters' is that they start with a false assumption. They insist that the America of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln must first be destroyed and then on the ruins they will reconstruct an America after their own pattern. They do not know that the America of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln has been the new deal and that during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries we have been making great social progress. The common man is getting his place in the sun. Why try to put him back into the Dark Ages?"

"Last summer I asked some of the individuals in this group what their concrete plan was for bringing on the proposed overthrow of the established American social order."

"I was told that they believed that by thwarting our then evident recovery they would be able to prolong the country's destitution until they had demonstrated to the American people that the Government must operate industry and commerce. I was told that the Government must operate industry and commerce. I was told that, of course, commercial banks could not make long-time capital loans and that they would be able to destroy by propaganda the other institutions that had been making our capital loans. Then we can push Uncle Sam into the position where he must make these capital loans. And, of course, when Uncle Sam becomes our financier he must also follow his money with control and management."

ROOSEVELT IS CALLED "ONLY THE KERENSKY"

"The most surprising statement made to me was the following:

"We believe that we have Mr. Roosevelt in the middle of a swift stream and that the current is so strong that he cannot turn back or escape from it. We believe that we can keep Mr. Roosevelt there until we are ready to supplant him with a Stalin. We all think that Mr. Roosevelt is only the Kerensky of this revolution."

"When I asked why the President would not see through this scheme, they replied:

"We are on the inside. We can control the avenues of influence. We can make the President believe that he is making decisions for himself."

"They said, 'A leader must appear to be a strong man of action. He must make decisions and many times make them quickly, whether good or bad. Soon he will feel a superhuman flow of power from the flow of decisions themselves—good or bad. Eventually he can easily be displaced because of his bad decisions.'

"With Mr. Roosevelt's background we do not expect him to see this revolution through."

"They said that such individuals can be induced to kindle the fires of revolution. But strong men must take their place when the country is once engulfed in flames."

"I asked how they would explain to the American people why their plans for retarding the recovery were not restoring recovery."

"Oh", they said, "that would be easy." All that they would need to do would be to point the finger of scorn at the traitorous opposition."

"These traitors in the imaginary war against the depression would be made the goats, and the American people would agree that they, the 'brain trusters', should be more firm in dealing with the opposition."

"Thus they, the 'brain trusters', would soon be able to use the police power of the Government and 'crack down' on the opposition with a 'big stick.' In the meantime they would extend the gloved hand and keep the 'big stick' in the background."

BANK ON PSYCHOLOGY OF EMPTY STOMACHS

"I was frankly told that I underestimated the power of propaganda. That, since the World War, propaganda had been developed into a science. That they could make the newspapers and magazines beg for mercy by threatening to take away much of their advertising by a measure to compel only the unvarnished truth in advertising."

"That they could make the financiers be good by showing up at public investigations the crooks in the game. And that the power of public investigation in their own hands alone would make the cold chills run up and down the spines of the other business leaders and politicians—honest men as well as crooks."

"They were sure that they could depend upon the 'psychology of empty stomachs' and they would keep them empty. The masses would soon agree that anything should be done rather than nothing. Any escape from present miseries would be welcome, even though it should turn out to be another misery."

"They were sure that the leaders of industry and labor could be kept quiet by the hope of getting their own share of the Government doles in the form of loans, and contracts for material and labor—provided they were subservient."

"They were sure that the colleges and schools could be kept in line by the hope of Federal aid until the many 'new dealers' in the schools and colleges had control of them."

SAID DOLES WOULD WIN FARMERS OVER

"They were sure that their propaganda could inflame the masses against the old social order and the honest men as well as the crooks that represent that order."

"I asked what they would do when the Government could no longer dole out relief in the grand manner. By that time, it was answered, the oft-repeated exhortation to industry and commerce to make jobs out of confidence and to produce goods and pay wages out of psychology, together with their other propaganda, would have won the people to the idea that the only way out was for Government itself to operate industry and commerce.

"They were certain that they did not want to operate agriculture for a long time. But the farmers could be won by doles to support Government operation of industry and commerce.

"Farmers would be delighted to get their hands in the public trough for once in the history of the country. The farmers would be one with the masses—united for a redistribution of the wealth of the other fellow. All that they would need to do with the opposition would be to ask, 'Well, what is your plan?'"

THE HAND OF ESAU

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill which proposes to put the cotton farmer in a strait-jacket, to make him a criminal because he dares raise two bunches of cotton where one grew before. I am opposed to dictatorships and tyranny in any form, however benevolent that despotism may seem in its inception. I want this Government to continue a government of law, not of men.

However gentle the voice of the man Jacob may sound to those who have been kept from all information because of propaganda and censorship, the cotton farmers of the South will in time learn that they have sold their birthright and liberties and freedom for a mess of pottage. Their liberties to earn their living as they see fit and to grow two bales of cotton where they grew one before will be set aside by the hairy, tyrannical hand of Esau.

Material waste is bad enough, gross and wanton as it has been under this administration, but, of course, it weighs as nothing when you compare it to the waste, destruction, and ruin of human liberty, our priceless heritage handed down to us by the patriots who established themselves in a wilderness to escape the despotism of Europe—the same old thing that is being fed us now, under the guise of the "new deal."

Clearly it is for us, as we vote on this measure, to bear in mind our duty to our descendants even as our forefathers did for us. They sacrificed to build a country and to establish over it a humane Constitution, which makes it possible for us to enjoy those privileges of earning a living and following such pursuits of happiness as we may choose unmolested and unregimented by any dictatorship, State or Federal.

The spirit breathed into this Republic in '76, continued on through Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt, and is still in the heart of every honest American citizen and will assert itself once he understands what is being done to him and his country.

In July last year wheat was $1.20 and everything in proportion. In 30 days after the "National Racketeering Association" was put into effect, wheat fell to 80 cents and other products in proportion. Truly the N.R.A. is the "National Ruin Act" and is following out the prediction that it was put into effect only for the purpose of seeing to it that business and labor remained hungry until the dictatorship coup had been accomplished and the tyranny of government by a benevolent despot fastened permanently upon the people.

My mother taught me that it was a sin against man and God to waste in any form, that I would go hungry if I wasted or destroyed good food. Yet the illogical Government leadership in the destruction of all economic standards heretofore a part of our training can only be explained in the Biblical quotation that "a little child shall lead us."

It is evident that destruction and waste is the keynote of this administration. The burning of thousands and thousands of pigs that might well have gone to feed the hungry, the plowing under of 15,000,000 acres of cotton that would have gone into raiment to clothe the naked and freezing, the expenditure of $1,350,000,000 under the C.W.A. to hire men to sweep leaves from one side of the road and back again, while our wounded soldiers are deprived by imperial edict of just compensation, cause me to suspect that such wanton waste may be too dearly paid for, for who can deny that perhaps next year and the next may be a famine? The food and clothing, the necessities of life, so wantonly destroyed, perhaps money can no longer buy and our prayers go unanswered in punishment of the wanton sin of destruction.

Hard sense, experience, and the past to guide the future have been so utterly ignored that perhaps we need a Joan of Arc to call attention to the bewildered and misinformed to again revive their interest, loyalty, and patriotism.

A prominent man the other day said at a banquet at Washington that Washington reminded him of an insane asylum with a smiling superintendent. A Congressman at a gathering here in Washington said that the N.R.A. stood for "nuts running America."

In Joan of Arc's time the so-called "smart set" of France—the governing set, the brain trust, the foolish despotism that ruthlessly flung away the rights of the people to gratify their personal lust; mad with power, insane with ambition, the nobility nuts running France scorned this visionary Joan of Arc as a liar and fraud that she dared to claim Divine guidance. See the sinister face of Bishop Beauvais light up with a grin of sardonic triumph as he asked Joan, upon her trial that resulted in her being burned at the stake, whether she is in a state of grace. To answer either "yes" or "no" would be self-conviction. Listen to this 17-year-old illiterate peasant patriot as she replies, "If I am, please God to keep me in it. If I am not, please God to put me in it", and decide whether she was a dupe, or as she now stands, a saint of the Church of Rome. Or in more modern comparison, whether Dr. Wirt has uncovered conditions as they are or whether his timely exposé is to be lightly passed over by the modern Beauvais as a dream of no consequence and without solid foundation.

When hungry wolves were prowling through the streets of Paris devouring human bodies strewn there by war and pestilence, when hope of unity of France seemed lost, it was Joan of Arc, with her faith in the Divine intelligence, that in the darkest hour of desperate peril of France came forth like a shining angel and led the disjointed military forces of France to unity and glorious victory, culminating in the Battle of Orleans, giving France a permanent nationality that endures today and ranks her with the leading nations of the world. Just as the disclosures of this modern patriot, Dr. Wirt, have stirred every patriotic heart to resent this insidious thing called "war on depression" that "has wound itself to the topmost mast and there hangs hissing at the noble men below" who dare to defy its leadership.

Our Executive has gathered to himself in the special session of Congress alone 77 powers and authorities which did not exist or were taken from Congress and the courts. We all know the additional powers he has taken in this session and all in the name of the new deal, and he wants now to make them all permanent.

The new deal is the same old deal that Essau gave Jacob. Now that a congressional hearing of Dr. Wirt is inevitable and the incendiaries are to be uncovered, our President fishes while the Republic burns.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial which I peculiarly commend to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], who are very much disturbed with reference to the so-called "revelations" of Dr. Wirt. I would suggest that the treatment mentioned in this editorial might be applicable to any who take this matter seriously. I ask that the editorial from the New York Times may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 26, 1934]

POLITICAL BRAIN SURGERY

Nay, I do bear a brain.—Nurse, Romeo and Juliet, act I, scene 3). The first general impression when reading of Dr. Wirt's discovery that there are traitorous Communists in President Roosevelt's "brain trust" was that somebody had been fooling him to the top of his bent. It is well known that the original "brain trust" has been pretty well dissolved. This was not done by enforcing the antitrust laws but apparently because of cerebral fatigue, in which Mr. Roosevelt himself seems to have shared. At any rate, we know what became of the chief "brain truster". He left Washington and, as Dr. Johnson said of the clergyman who was afterward hanged, "sank so low as to become an editor." Another one is now in Puerto Rico. Still another is about to investigate the two schools of thought about silver in China. A fourth is racking his brains in the effort to understand the legislature at Albany.

Of course, there remain a number of fledgling "brain trusters" at Washington, and it is possible that from one of them Dr. Wirt got his flesh-creeping tale. It is wholly conceivable that one or more of them think oftener of revolution than of recovery. They know all about the Russian formula. First the mild-mannered Keren-sky, then the ruthless Lenin. This may have been expounded seriously to Dr. Wirt. That it will never be applied in this country, one of the best evidences is the universal guffaw with which the disclosure was greeted.

As in duty bound, however, the committee of the House is determined to pierce to the heart of the mystery. It has resolved to summon Dr. Wirt and demand that he give up the names of those who intrusted to him the dark secret. He declares that he is ready to testify, but is in doubt whether he ought to name names. Yet he has no doubt that a conspiracy exists to hamper the President and to hasten a revolution. The leader of it, according to Dr. Wirt, is simply biding his time. The people with whom he is to set up a dictatorship of the proletariat do not yet know who he is, but he knows that they are simply waiting to be puppets in his hands when the hour strikes. If he could be dragged out of his obscurity and examined by Representatives in Congress, the results might be more interesting and fruitful than those to be had from investigating Dr. Wirt's "No name series."

The case is really one for a psychiatrist or a surgeon, rather than for a Congressman. Dr. Harvey Cushing ought to be sent for to show what brain surgery can do when applied to politics. His cross-examination would doubtless be made by means of an electric knife. Of course, he would have to disclaim any connection with the General Electric, or else Congress would not let him proceed. First he would diagnose the symptoms of one of Dr. Wirt's young "brain trusters". Are the areas of speech affected? If so, the whole country would call upon Dr. Cushing to declare the case inoperable. A silent "brain truster" would be thought a special gift of Providence. Is the man losing his memory? Does he forget his best friends? Does he show evidences of echolalia—always repeating his most incoherent theories? These are all possibilities which it is evident that the chairman of the committee could not explore. The obvious alternative is to pave the way for another triumph of brain surgery.

The times have been that when the brains were out the man would die. This is not true of the "brain trust". Being a kind of organism which propagates by fission, it can lose one or more members, like the cerebellum, and go on apparently uninjured. But it ought still to be possible to bring to light whatever is grave in all this business. If there are harebrained enthusiasts professing to work for the administration, who in their hours of ease outline in a large way the revolution which they hope to bring about and in which they are confident they will figure largely, let them be made to stand up so that the country can get a good look at them. Then our ancient humor can be counted upon to do the rest.

REGULATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8402) to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in reference to the matter now pending before the Senate—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired. Under the unanimous-consent agreement no Senator may speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes on any amendment. The Senator has spoken once on the pending amendment. He will have to bide his time until another amendment shall be offered.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I inquire whether there has been any determination with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] as modified by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has not as yet been acted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have an amendment which I desire to offer when that amendment shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as modified by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, let me implore the Senate, if it is interested at all in the pending bill, to proceed with its consideration for a very brief period without extraneous matters. Of course, it is interesting to read what may have been said by Dr. Wirt from one of the States of the Union about what may transpire in the future.

I remember in my youth reading with some degree of amusement Baron Munchausen, and I have recalled during all the long years the pleasure with which I perused again and again Alice in Wonderland. But the remarks which are attributed to the distinguished gentleman, Dr. Wirt, have neither the interest nor pleasure nor imagination of Baron Munchausen, nor have they the delightful literary quality and charming grace of Mr. Carroll's remarkable work which has lasted through the years with ever-increasing joy to us all. I cannot find myself otherwise than cold in reading the sort of emanation coming from Dr. Wirt concerning the awful things about to happen.

I have no fear of a dictator in this Nation. I have no fear of what may happen if a brain trust is found in our country. Notwithstanding we may stumble at times and notwithstanding our nerves may become ragged in the efforts we are called upon to put forth, we are still going on in this Nation in the good old American way. There is no danger of a dictator in the Presidency nor any danger of the abolition of the Congress of the United States. These emanations, Mr. President, are not in my opinion worthy of the utilization of the time of the Congress of the United States for 15 seconds.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, we are now about to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, as modified by the Senator from North Carolina, its purpose being to restrict the operation of the bill to 1 year. I voted for the cotton legislation at the last session, but I doubt the wisdom of this bill. My better judgment tells me it is not constitutional, but I rather think I am going to vote for the bill. If the 1-year restriction is adopted, we will be back here before 1935 is over; and if this plan is shown by that time to be a success, we can reenact and extend the legislation.

I think it is a very wise provision to limit a matter of doubtful constitutionality and of such wide experimentation in the way in which the amendment as modified proposes to limit it. Our President has often said that he would be the first to give up an experiment if he found it to be a mistake. I shall be one of the first to continue this experiment if it is found to be a success. I fear the consequences of the bill, however. I really fear them. It may do some good and I shall be willing to abdicate my better judgment in many respects if we can limit it to 1 year. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 8, in line 1, after the word "period", insert the following:

Provided, however, That no State shall receive an allotment of less than 200,000 bales of cotton if in any 1 year of 5 years prior to this date the production of the State equaled 250,000 bales.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California to make a brief explanation of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, this amendment is rendered absolutely essential from the standpoint of the West by virtue of the amendment presented by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], which has been adopted.

In some States, particularly in the State from which I come, cotton production has really developed only during the last decade; and the 5-year period having been changed to 10 years, if the allotments are to be made upon an average during that period, it, of course, will place at a very serious disadvantage a State which only during the last decade has been developing its cotton production.

That is the first reason that renders this amendment absolutely just and absolutely appropriate.

I shall not go into the details of the difference between cotton production in the West and cotton production in the South. I shall not attempt to detail the differences that thus exist by reason of land values, by reason of the irrigation-district systems, and by reason of other charges which make it much more difficult for the West to do the job in relation to the production of cotton than for the South. But on every conceivable plane of justice we have asked that this allotment be made. If the production in the previous 5 years has been 250,000 bales in any one year, we ask that no less than 200,000 bales shall be accorded in an allotment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the amendment.

I should like to be with the Senator from California on this amendment, but the Senator from California has stated the case from his standpoint. Here are the facts:

When the conditions got so very bad that we had to decrease our cotton production in the South, beginning with Louisiana, all through the Southeast we began to decrease the production of cotton in the past 5 years; and, as the Senator from California says, they began to build up their production of cotton.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; pardon me. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not want the Senator to understand that. I meant to say to him that our production was later in time during the past decade.

Mr. LONG. I know that.

Mr. JOHNSON. But it was not a case of building up, because sedulously and carefully we dealt with the allotments that were made during the past few years in reducing the cotton acreage.

Mr. LONG. But, if the Senator will bear with me, the California cotton business has been built up since we have been accumulating this surplus. For the past 5 or 6 years we have been accumulating this surplus cotton crop, all back from the years 1928 and 1929 up to 1934.

Now, we have a rule here that we shall average the last 10 years in order to try to get a table that will be fair for everyone; but along comes one of these little cotton States—I do not mean a little State otherwise, but I mean from the standpoint of cotton production—and, inasmuch as there was a little bit of laying off in some of the other States, they looked over the line and decided that they would plant a little cotton also. It is not a real part of their business; but if we give every little State that can raise cotton the right to raise 250,000 bales of cotton, there are plenty of States that can raise 250,000 bales of cotton.

Mr. President, we are fair to California on this matter and to the other States. If California's cotton production over the past 10 years does not average up to the amount raised during the past 5 years, they should not be permitted to take advantage of the depression period, when there has been a surplus of cotton, in order to build up a business which has been a handicap to us and which now will allow them to take advantage of almost their peak production.

So I submit that this amendment is not fair to us. It is not fair to impose a rule here that might allow California to come right close up to their peak production because of its being a new industry and restrict us in our raising of cotton to something like two thirds of the peak production. That is what I object to; and I think the Senator would make a mistake to hook on an amendment here that will make an exception of these little States that have recently developed a cotton industry. I think it will do very much to impair the effect of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 23, in section 14 (d), it is proposed to strike out the words "$1,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 1 year, or both", and to insert in lieu thereof "$100."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, let me explain the amendment. It strikes out the portion of the bill which, in the penalty section, undertakes to make a felony out of violations of the act; and it strikes out the $1,000 fine and limits it to $100.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 20, line 24, in section 20 (b), it is proposed to strike out the words "6 months" and insert in lieu thereof the words "30 days."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on page 18, line 1, I move to strike out the words "regulation issued" and insert "penal statute enacted."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, lines 1 and 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "regulation issued" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "penal statute enacted."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the effect of that change.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the bill provides that anyone who shall violate any regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture shall be fined $200. The amendment provides that anyone who shall violate any penal statute enacted by the Secretary of Agriculture shall be fined $200.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on page 18, line 9, I move to strike out the words "make such regulations" and insert the words "enact such penal statutes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the words "make such regulations" and insert the words "enact such penal statutes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on page 18, beginning on line 23, I move to strike out subdivision (c), which reads as follows:

(c) The proceeds derived from the tax are hereby authorized to be appropriated to be made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purposes of carrying out the cotton program of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and for administrative expenses and refunds of taxes under this act.

It seems to me it is unwise legislation to permit funds which may be derived from a processing tax to be expended without proper reference to the Treasury and proper appropriation by Congress. All taxes collected under this bill ought to be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and if there shall be a deficit in the operation of the bill, if the amount which we appropriate for its enforcement shall prove inadequate, then let appeal be made to Congress.

I think legislation which authorizes the conversion of funds which come to officials for further enforcement of the law rather than having them converted into the Treasury is most unwise; and it seems to me no argument in favor of the amendment ought to be necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understand that following this bill our next order is to take up unobjected bills on the calendar.

Information has come to me within the last 30 minutes that the House has already taken action overriding the veto by the President of the independent offices appropriation bill, which includes the veterans' compensation. I understand that there is no haste, inasmuch as it takes only a moment or two for the endorsement to be made and the bill to be brought over here; but several minutes have already elapsed, and nothing has yet been done. I had intended to forego making any remarks on this bill to-day, so that the bill might be expeditiously passed; but inasmuch as we should vote on the veto message now, and it is due here, and ought to have been here 30 minutes ago, I shall make some remarks that I had not intended to make because of the fact that I wanted to hasten the work of the Senate.

I desired to say something on the question of silver, and I was tempted to offer an amendment on the subject here today, but my friend from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has been so generous, and he is such a good friend of mine personally and politically, that I am afraid, along with my association with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I have really allowed my better judgment to be warped by my friendship for them, and I was induced not to offer the silver amendment. Nevertheless, I am going to make just a few remarks on the question of silver at this time.

As my friend the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] said earlier today—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As in executive session, sometime ago John A. Donahue was confirmed as postmaster at Newburgh, N.Y.

Mr. LONG. Just a moment. I do not yield for anything that will take me from the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana says he does not yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. This matter will take only a moment.

Mr. LONG. I do not want to give up the floor. The Senator can make his motion after I get through. I have reasons for that. I might lose the floor. I can yield only for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. LONG. Do I understand that I will not lose the floor if I yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Louisiana yields for the transaction of business, he will lose the floor.

Mr. LONG. Then, I will not yield.

Mr. President, we have in this country today $5,000,000,000 in currency, or approximately that amount. I should like to attract the attention of the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], if I may. The last report I have read indicated that we had about five and a half billion dollars in circulating currency. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether that has been decreased since the time of the last report?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It has been.

Mr. LONG. What is the figure now?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is less than five and a half billion. It is about five billion four hundred million. It decreased last week.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have compiled figures today to show that the United States is operating now with 59 percent of $5,000,000,000. In other words, the United States is operating today on the same basis on which we were operating a year and a half ago, with $3,000,000,000 of circulating currency. Five billion dollars, with the gold content of the dollar at 59 cents, means that we have today currency with a purchasing value of only $3,000,000,000, whereas a year and a half ago, those of use who were favoring a sound expansion of the currency and the remonetization of silver, were able to say that there was at least $7,000,000,000 of circulating currency. So that the figures do not of themselves tell half the story. They do not half state the case. When we say that we have decreased the gold content of the dollar from 100 cents to 59 cents, when we say that we have a currency today that is $5,000,000,000, as against $7,000,000,000, a little over 1 year ago, that is just the same as saying that we have decreased the purchasable circulating currency to the extent of around 60 cents out of every dollar that was circulating a year and a half ago. So we continue to face the condition that unless we do something to put money into the hands of the people, if we do not provide a better purchasable medium of exchange, by an expansion that is sound, one which can be interchanged between the various countries of the several hemispheres, we are going to face and we do today face a stagnation under which we cannot exchange goods or commodities not only for domestic purposes, but for international purposes.

Mr. President, I had hoped that the veto message would reach the Senate. The Senator from South Carolina indicates to me by a nod that it is not coming over. I see no reason why it should not come over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will state that the Senator from Oregon advised me that he would not be ready to proceed with the veto message this afternoon on account of the fact that a number of Senators are absent who would like to be present. I do not anticipate that the message would be taken up for action this afternoon even if it should come over.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, in conference with the Senator from Arkansas a few moments ago, I expressed the opinion that I did not think we should have a vote this afternoon on the veto message, because of want of knowledge and notice on the part of Members of the Senate. I feel certain that there are some Senators absent who would want to be present when a matter of such importance was voted on. I feel certain they should have the privilege of voting on an important matter of this kind, and for that reason I came to the conclusion that we should not vote immediately upon the receipt of the message, which, by the way, is not here, but that we should give fair opportunity to the absent Senators to be present. So I expressed to the Senator from Arkansas the opinion that it was my best judgment that we should not vote until tomorrow. If the Senate should determine otherwise, I am here, and, personally, I have no choice whatsoever.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I think nearly all the Senators are here. I think there are more here than will be here tomorrow or the day after, and that is the reason why I wanted the vote to come this afternoon. My judgment tells me that now is the best time for us to vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not know what is the object of the Senator from Louisiana, or what is his state of mind, but I am not prepared to agree that a vote should be taken at this time, first, because we are not in receipt of the message. Secondly, we have a unanimous-consent agreement to go forward with the pending bill, with a limitation on debate, and we should act on the bill, and adjourn or recess, in my opinion, and take up the veto message tomorrow. That is my final judgment on the matter.

Mr. LONG. But if the message comes in tomorrow, can we take it up tomorrow?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, when the message comes in, it will then be competent for the Senate to determine what it wishes to do about it. I am not willing to enter into any contracts in regard to the matter until the message shall be received.

Mr. LONG. That is just the point I had in mind. The bonus bill came over and lay on the desk for a week, and was not referred to the Committee on Finance until yesterday. Seven days, or five days, or whatever the time was, has been lost in the consideration of the bonus bill, because it either should have been taken up and put on the calendar of the Senate, or referred to the committee, the day it came in.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The rules of the Senate contemplate prompt action in matters pertaining to vetoes. There is no disposition on the part of anyone to delay the disposal of the veto message unduly, and I can say, and take pleasure in saying, that it is my desire to facilitate action on the message; but, in accordance with the statement of the Senator from Oregon, and the statement I made a moment ago, I do not think we could dispose of the message this afternoon even if it were in the jurisdiction of the Senate. It has not reached the Senate as yet.

Mr. LONG. The point I am trying to make to the Senator from Arkansas is that if the message shall be brought in this afternoon—and it ought to have been here nearly an hour ago—then we know we can vote tomorrow, but if it is brought in tomorrow, then on objection it would probably be carried over until the next day.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Let me inform the Senator from Louisiana that it is a privileged matter and can be voted on tomorrow or the next day or the moment it arrives in the Senate, and no advantage can be taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a privileged matter.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is there any reason on earth why it should not be voted on today?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is not here.

Mr. CLARK. There is no reason why it should not be here, Mr. President. I think the Senate should remain in session and vote on it today.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senate has no jurisdiction over it until it arrives in the Senate. In accordance with the judgment of the Senator from Oregon, I shall carry out my understanding with him, as far as I am capable of doing so, and pass the matter over until tomorrow.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. It occurs to me that we should proceed with the matter under consideration, to wit, the cotton bill, which is the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the speech of the Senator from Louisiana. As quickly as he yields the floor, the Chair will submit the pending question.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to show that, as the Senator from Missouri has indicated, the Senators are now here, and we ought to vote on this veto message today. I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Louisiana has expired. Does the Senator suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Black	Carey	Davis
Ashurst	Borah	Clark	Dickinson
Austin	Brown	Connally	Dieterich
Bachman	Bulkley	Cooldge	Dill
Bailey	Bulow	Copeland	Duffy
Bankhead	Byrnes	Costigan	Erickson
Barbour	Capper	Couzens	Fess
Barkley	Caraway	Cutting	Fletcher

Frazier	Keyes	Patterson	Thomas, Okla.
George	King	Pittman	Thomas, Utah
Gibson	La Follette	Pope	Thompson
Glass	Logan	Reed	Townsend
Goldsborough	Loneragan	Reynolds	Tydings
Gore	Long	Robinson, Ark.	Vandenberg
Hale	McGill	Robinson, Ind.	Van Nuys
Harrison	McKellar	Russell	Wagner
Hastings	McNary	Schall	Walcott
Hatch	Murphy	Sheppard	Walsh
Hatfield	Neely	Shipstead	Wheeler
Hayden	Nye	Smith	White
Johnson	O'Mahoney	Steiwer
Kean	Overton	Stephens

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of the Senate for a moment while I offer an amendment which is of importance and should be adopted. I move to strike out section 24, which in part reads as follows:

Sec. 24. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to purchase cotton that may be produced in excess of the quantity allotted to producers at a price not to exceed 55 percent of the central-market price as established in accordance with the provisions of section 4 (b) of this act, in such quantities as he may deem it possible and advisable to dispose of under special conditions for charitable purposes and in the development of new and extended uses of cotton.

I digress for a moment to challenge attention to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is to buy cotton without limit and to dispose of it for "charitable purposes." It does not indicate what the charitable purposes are, to whom the cotton is to be distributed or given, but he has the sole authority to purchase and to dispose of cotton so purchased for charitable purposes, and he is authorized to "find new and extended uses for cotton." It does not indicate how he is to determine the amount that is to be expended in the ascertainment and development of these new uses to which cotton is to be put.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. DICKINSON rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I really think that is the best provision in the bill.

Mr. KING. That may be. I should like some limitation upon this grant of authority to the Secretary.

The second part is as follows:

The Secretary may enter into agreements with relief agencies and States, Territories, the District of Columbia, and political subdivisions and instrumentalities of the United States, or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in the conduct of operations under this section.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to suggest that a similar provision has been used, and the Secretary of Agriculture has bought thousands of heads of hogs, not for charitable purposes but for the purpose of holding up the price when they imposed the processing tax, and this is primarily a camouflage to do the same thing in this bill.

Mr. KING. There are no limitations placed upon the Secretary of Agriculture. He may spend as much as he pleases for so-called "charitable purposes", and he is the sole judge of what they are. He is to develop additional uses for cotton. Of course, that carries with it the implication that he may build factories, secure machinery and mechanical devices, employ the number of individuals necessary for the development of uses for cotton, for purposes not in the past known. It seems to me that this provision is so objectionable that it ought to be voted out of the bill without further discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 26. Nothing in this act shall be held to apply to the production of cotton from any farm or tract of land of the area 160 acres or less in which the area cultivated for cotton or the acreage for the 5 years last preceding the passage of this act did not exceed 25 percent of the total cultivated area.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to have read in my time a letter from Judge Xenophon Caverno, a man who is recognized by agricultural associations and agricultural interests of the United States as one of the ablest experts in the United States on cotton. He lives in southeast Missouri. His letter explains the purpose of my amendment better than I can do it myself. I ask to have the letter read in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The clerk read as follows:

CANALOU, Mo., February 9, 1934.

HON. BENNETT C. CLARK,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CLARK: If the Cotton Belt of Missouri had a representative in the House I should not have to call on you to look out for our interest in the situation precipitated by the Bankhead bill. I am handicapped in putting the situation before you because I only know from casual reports in the daily papers what the bill actually contains. It is evident that the bill has the possibility of inflicting a peculiar hardship on the Missouri cotton district, although this may not be intentional. One cannot avoid the suspicion, however, that when representatives in Congress from the old, low-producing cotton areas provide for a 10-year cotton record as a basis for allowed acreage they are consciously discriminating against the newer and more productive areas. Missouri has the highest average yield of any State in the Union except the irrigated districts, and an enormous proportion of its cotton land in newly reclaimed land. If the report in the papers that the Bankhead bill provides for a 10-year base is true, it is evident that this is an arbitrary discrimination against Missouri and puts a penalty on efficient production. Even the 5-year base called for in the present voluntary plan is unjust to the newer producing regions and has not been used in the corn or wheat campaigns. I have felt that this 5-year base was put in for this particular reason, but certainly stretching out to 10 years is unjust.

In the voluntary plan, which is now under way, it is possible for farmers who cannot comply with the plan without too great hardship to stay out. Mr. Wallace said that the plan was designed to make it more profitable to come in than stay out. Under southeast Missouri conditions it is, in most cases, more profitable to stay out than come in, but an enormous majority of the cotton farmers are accepting the loss in order to support the plan. The plan calls for reduction in cotton acreage of around 40 percent. This means one thing in the real Cotton Belt where cotton is practically the only crop, but another thing in our system of diversified farming in which the cotton acreage averages only 25 percent. Reducing 25 percent by 40 percent leaves only 15 percent, and this will not provide a living for a cotton family. In this way we are penalized for following the advice of the Department of Agriculture and diversifying our farm practices.

Our second handicap comes from the fact that a good many farms have no records of past years' production, due to foreclosures and tax sales, with the shifting of owners and tenants which accompany these processes. Also we are breaking in new land and many finished farms have been lying out entirely due to the havoc that has been wrought by the farm deflation. Under the voluntary plan such farms cannot share in the benefits but they are not blacklisted out of production entirely.

I am not charging that because the two BANKHEADS represent one of the old producing areas they are consciously writing into their bills limitations which work a hardship on newer producing areas, but apparently this will be the result. I am wondering whether you could not suggest that there be an exemption for farms in which the cotton production did not exceed 25 percent of the total cultivated area, or at least make the law so elastic that an exemption could be made by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Very truly yours,

XENOPHON CAVERNO.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Borah	Connally	Dill
Ashurst	Brown	Coolidge	Duffy
Austin	Bulkeley	Copeland	Erickson
Bachman	Bulow	Costigan	Fess

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. In my time I wish to have read several short statements, 1 by Arthur Brisbane; 1 by John Dickinson, 1 by the Senator from Michigan, Mr. Vandenberg; 1 by Gen. William Mitchell; 1 by Hiroshi Saito; 1 by Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor; 1 by Stephen S. Dybetz, of the Soviet Automobile and Tractor Trust; and 1 by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. I send these to the desk and ask that they be read in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

By Arthur Brisbane: "The Mayo brothers, great surgeons, have made money, without wanting to be rich. Having accumulated half a million, they give it to be used for medical and surgical science in the University of Minnesota. 'The money came from the sick and should be returned to the sick' is their simple statement.

"A real mind cares little for money, except to make it useful. Agassiz, great naturalist, said: 'I am too busy to make money.' Spinoza, greatest Jewish philosopher, said to the English admirer who wished to leave him a large fortune, 'No; leave it to your brother, he will enjoy it; leave me in your will, if you choose, 40 cents a day. If I lose my sight and can no longer earn a living grinding lenses, I shall need that to live.' He had not much more than 40 cents when he died, after teaching other philosophers to think, his main assets being 1 bed and 1 silver-handled penknife."

By John Dickinson, Assistant Secretary of Commerce: "The major problem of democratic government is to organize its mechanism so as to facilitate agreement among the various elements represented and agreement on measures wisely conceived in the public interest. There is one element for which it is indispensable that room should be made in any democratic system if the system is to be workable. I refer to the element of leadership."

By ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, Senator from Michigan: "When the field administration of the Civil Works Administration is so scandalized in 90 short days that the Department of Justice has to be put upon the trail of graft and exploitation in 45 out of the 48 States, I say that the President should pray to Heaven for a vigorous and vigilant opposition party to help him in his own eager desire to discipline his own chiselers who would wreck his own great adventure."

By Gen. William Mitchell, former director of military aviation: "Flying the air mail in properly equipped planes should be kindergarten work for military flyers who should be trained to fly anywhere, in all parts of the world."

"The present equipment of the Air Corps has not been allowed to develop properly by stock-market gamblers controlling aviation companies. I believe that great good will come from the present situation and that planes will be made safe."

By Hiroshi Saito, Japanese Ambassador to the United States: "War between Japan and the United States is as unlikely as war between the United States and Great Britain."

"The argument that the two great English-speaking countries will ever fight each other over foreign trade is ridiculous, for you are each other's greatest customer."

"A situation similar to this on the Atlantic holds good on the Pacific. There Japan and the United States are each other's best customer. The American people buy more Japanese products each year than any other people in the world. The most important of all is silk; you buy practically all the silk we ship abroad."

"That is why we Japanese all hope that the depression in your country will come to a speedy end. We want all your ladies to have as much silk as they want."

By Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor: "The unemployment insurance measure of Senator Wagner has my unqualified approval. I do not say that it is the last word, but it is the best device that I have seen and the most practical. It carries out the pledge of the Democratic Party."

By Stephen S. Dybetz, vice chairman, Soviet Automobile and Tractor Trust: "You Americans are a very rich people. Either you don't know what to do with your great national resources or you don't know how to make them go around."

"You Americans are so rich that you look at a new car just like a new suit of clothes. You have a brown one for the daytime and a black one for the evening, with a special one for every season of the year. We require that a car should serve 3 to 4 years, so as to pay for itself. That's why we would not follow you in all the style changes of your cars."

By William Green, president American Federation of Labor: "The N.R.A. hasn't protected labor to any great extent."

"Its chief accomplishment, in the view of organized labor, is that it has made the workingman believe that he has the right to organize, and the labor movement is expanding."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CUTTING (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and withhold my vote. If the Senator from Florida were present, he would vote "nay", and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I have a pair for the day with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I refrain from voting.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRNES. I inquire whether the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a pair with the Senator from Nebraska on this measure, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] with the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—36

Bailey	Dickinson	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Borah	Dieterich	Keyes	Schall
Bulkley	Fess	King	Steiwer
Caraway	Gibson	Long	Thompson

Byrd	Frazier	Metcalf	Walcott
Byrnes	Hebert	Norbeck
Capper	Lewis	Norris

So Mr. CLARK's amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, returned by the President of the United States, with his objections, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—VETO MESSAGE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for consideration of the Executive veto just brought to the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, at 12 o'clock noon, the message be laid before the Senate, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am forced to object to that. I do not see any reason why that bill, which was before the Senate for nearly 2 months, should not now be disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Executive veto be made a special order for 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. CLARK. I offer a preferential motion. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Executive veto, and agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am opposed to the motion made by the Senator from Missouri for the following reasons:

First, every Member of the Senate is entitled to an opportunity to be present and to record his vote on this veto.

Second, a measure of time ought to be given to the consideration of the veto message. It has not as yet been read in the Senate.

As stated some moments ago, I conferred with the Senator from Oregon when it was learned that the veto message would reach the Senate, and he suggested, as already stated, that he would like to have the matter go over until tomorrow in order that all Senators might have the opportunity of being present. I consented to that arrangement, and so announced on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have stated I hope the Senate will vote down the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about the consideration of the bill which has been vetoed. It has been before the Senate now for nearly 2 months, and I desire to state that some of us in this body have been very roughly dealt with in the consideration of the measure. There is no Member of this body who was more thoroughly in favor of every line and every item in the so-called "Steiwer-McCarran amendment" than I was. I was led to believe that the President would accept the so-called "Byrnes amendment", and would not accept the so-called "Steiwer-McCarran amendment." Therefore, on that basis I voted against the Steiwer-McCarran amendment, and voted to enact into law the Byrnes amendment, which was passed with the bill when it finally went through the House and the Senate yesterday or the day before.

Mr. President, apparently the President was not satisfied with the so-called "Byrnes amendment", for which a number of votes were obtained in this body, and probably a number of votes were obtained in the House of Representatives, on the representation that the President would accept the amendment.

So far as I am concerned, I think that the sooner we can vote on this matter and dispose of it the better. I am in favor of voting on it tonight, and if we cannot vote on it tonight, I am in favor of voting on it as early as we can tomorrow. I shall continue to press for a vote on the Presidential veto at every opportunity from this point on.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, as I understand, it would be in order now to read the President's message. The Senator's motion, as I understand, is that we vote on the veto message.

Mr. CLARK. That is my motion. I shall be glad to have the President's message read. It is already in the newspapers, and most of the Members of the Senate have by this time read it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I was attempting to obviate the necessity of going into a discussion of the subject this afternoon. Of course, the message must be read before any action may be taken on it. The Senator from Missouri well understands that. The Constitution requires it.

We should take this matter up tomorrow and dispose of it in an orderly way. Not many Senators have even seen the veto message. I myself was able to procure a copy of it only some half hour or hour ago. I repeat my suggestion.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, of course we are all familiar with the desire of the Senator from Arkansas to re-form his lines over night. There is no question about it; that is the only purpose of the desire to postpone consideration of this matter until tomorrow.

I suggest that the veto message be read, and then I will renew my motion that the bill be passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALTOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. McAdoo]. Not knowing how he would vote, I refrain from voting. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]; and

The junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. WALSH. My colleague [Mr. COOLIDGE] is necessarily absent from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER. I have a pair for the day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 34, as follows:

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Dieterich	King	Russell
Bailey	Dill	Logan	Sheppard
Bankhead	Duffy	Loneragan	Stephens
Barkley	Erickson	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Black	Fletcher	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Brown	George	Murphy	Thompson
Bulkeley	Glass	O'Mahoney	Tydings
Bulow	Gore	Overton	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Harrison	Pittman	Wagner
Connally	Hatch	Pope	Walsh
Costigan	Hayden	Reynolds	Wheeler

NAYS—34

Adams	Cutting	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Davis	Keyes	Schall
Barbour	Dickinson	La Follette	Shipstead
Borah	Fess	Long	Steiwer
Capper	Gibson	McGill	Townsend
Caraway	Goldsborough	Neely	Vandenberg
Carey	Hale	Nye	White

Copeland	Hatfield	Reed

NOT VOTING—14

Bone	Hebert	Metcalf	Trammell
Byrd	Lewis	Norbeck	Walcott
Coolidge	McAdoo	Norris
Frazier	McCarran	Smith

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 28, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 27, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, hear us as we pray in the name of our Blessed Savior, who has given us forever the holy conceptions of Almighty God. It is faith in Thee that broods and nourishes the strength that does believe in the unattained. We pray that love and longing for the very best things may be the pilots of our souls. Inspire us with those high moral standards of the Master, which are designed to revolutionize the world. Let them direct our conduct, give clearness and certitude to our holy faith. Heavenly Father, touch the desires behind our thoughts, the inclinations behind our resolutions, for out of these spring the sources of life. Bless our homes, their altars, their libraries, and hold them in the unbroken and the unbreakable clasp of everlasting love. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 6663. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the authority conferred upon him by House Resolution 315, the Chair desires to inform the House that he did on March 26 sign the enrolled bill of the House, H.R. 6663.

The SPEAKER also announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 2089. An act to amend the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D.C. Code, title 5, ch. 3), relating to building-and-loan associations; and

S. 2950. An act to authorize steam railroads to electrify their lines within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on the following dates present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

On March 26, 1934:

H.R. 6663. An act making appropriation for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

On March 27, 1934:

H.R. 7966. An act to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order tomorrow, Calendar Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.Con.Res. 11. Concurrent resolution requesting the President to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2729, 73d Cong., 2d sess.) to repeal an act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, nos. 5 and 8.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the legislation proposed by the bill now before you is born out of economic necessity. The opponents of the measure base their opposition on two grounds; first, unconstitutionality, and second, economic unsoundness.

The issue, as developed in the debate on this legislation, is really whether the United States shall proceed upon the theory of self-containment or whether we shall proceed to expand our foreign trade and thus expand the operations of American industries and of American agriculture. The opponents of this measure have taken their stand along with Mr. Samuel Crowther, a writer on economics, one of whose publications was a book called "America Self-Contained." Mr. Crowther appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in the hearings on this bill, and his testimony was in line with the doctrine that he enunciated in this book. The minority members of the Ways and Means Committee took their stand with Mr. Crowther and are standing here today for the philosophy of America Self-Contained. This is the first time in the history of the great Republican Party that it has ever taken such an attitude. It has heretofore consistently stood for the proposition of expansion of our foreign trade, and the representatives of American industry who came before the Ways and Means Committee at the hearings took this latter attitude.

Mr. James A. Farrell, representing the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, an association which represents largely the industrial and commercial interests of this country, testified before our committee. He put into the record at that time a resolution adopted after a referendum had been taken upon the subject through the various member organizations. May I read the resolution, and then follow with a quotation from Mr. Farrell as the representative of industry in this country on the question of reciprocal trade agreements? The resolution is as follows:

The safeguarding and advancement of our foreign trade should be the purpose of a vigorous foreign commercial policy of our Government. Adaptation of our American economic structure to present world conditions calls for most careful scrutiny of existing policies. Keeping in mind the necessity of assuring stability to our internal industrial and agricultural enterprises through reasonable protection for American industry, our Government should have power to initiate reciprocal tariff arrangements with foreign countries where such bargaining would be clearly in our national interest. Such agreements would complement our existing flexible tariff in establishing for our country a tariff policy fair alike to our home industry and our competitors abroad.

Mr. Farrell followed the reading of this resolution by a statement to the committee as follows, and I quote from page 120 of the hearings:

Seven million persons, it is estimated, are dependent for their livelihood on our foreign trade. It is impossible, therefore, to deal effectively with the problem of unemployment without taking into account the vital importance of our overseas commerce as a means indispensable to the success of the National Recovery Act and as an aid to employment.

Still quoting Mr. Farrell:

The policy of bargaining our way to the markets of the world by means of reciprocal trade agreements is one to which Congress should give careful consideration. Other countries have delegated these powers to the executive and have already, as in the case of Great Britain and her Dominions, made considerable progress ahead of the United States in making foreign-trade promotion instrumental to national economic recovery.

As I will mention further on, we have been a little bit behind while our competitors abroad have been making agreements with other countries.

May I call your attention to the fact that since January 1, 1933, European countries have negotiated 68 of these trade agreements, and I will mention a few of the leading countries in order that you may see what important countries are included in this list that have made these trade agreements among the European nations.

Germany has made such trade agreements with the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Spain, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, and Italy.

Italy has made trade agreements with France and Germany.

Great Britain has made trade agreements with Finland, Latvia, Argentina, Estonia, Germany, Norway, and Sweden.

The Netherlands has made trade agreements with Germany and Poland.

Norway, with the United Kingdom and France.

Poland, with Belgium, Germany, and the Netherlands.

Spain, with France and Germany.

Sweden, with the United Kingdom, France, and Austria.

Switzerland, with France, Rumania, Germany, Czechoslovakia, and the United Kingdom.

Latvia, with the United Kingdom.

Chile with Argentina and Cuba.

Costa Rica with France.

Czechoslovakia with Switzerland and Germany.

Denmark with Germany.

Finland with France and the United Kingdom.

France with Switzerland, Spain, Costa Rica, Norway, Russia, Sweden, Estonia, Italy, and Finland.

I have read the names of only a few of these countries, and I have only referred to the particular treaties which involve customs concessions and not the most-favored-nation treaties.

Mr. Chairman, it is important at this point to call attention to the fact that out of about 50 of the leading nations of the world, something like 46 have vested in the executive either the absolute right to negotiate trade agreements or else the initial right to negotiate trade agreements and put them into operation with a reference back to the Parliament. In most of the European countries that require ratification by the Parliament of executive trade agreements the Premier is usually the leader of the majority in the Parliament, and hence a ratification by the Parliament is merely a formality.

So we have the picture of the leading commercial countries of the world, with very few exceptions, having this administrative authority to enter into trade agreements whereby customs concessions can be made in the interest of the trade of both parties to the contract, and they have in the last year actually executed 68 of these agreements, and the operation is going on at a rapid rate.

The United States is barred from participation in the negotiation of these reciprocal trade agreements because of the lack of Executive authority or of authority in the administrative branch of the Government to negotiate such agreements. Our tariff policy is so rigid, so cumbersome, and so unbendable that it is absolutely impossible under our present system to enter into these negotiations for reciprocal trade agreements. We have only the so-called "flexible provision" in the tariff act under which the President may raise or lower tariff duties 50 percent upon the recommendation and finding of the Tariff Commission that there is a difference in the cost of production of commodities here and abroad, and the average time it takes the Tariff Commission to make an investigation and a finding, upon which to make its recommendations to the President is about 11 months, and in many cases it is 14 or 18 months, and in some cases over 2 years.

It can be readily seen that with such a slow process, with such a cumbersome provision, it is impossible that this agency be used in negotiating trade agreements, and the only other power or authority that the President has to initiate reciprocal arrangements as to trade with other countries is under the general treaty-making power. He may under that authority enter into reciprocal arrangements with a foreign country, but he must then report back to the Senate just what the treaty is, and the treaty must be ratified by the Senate before it becomes effective.

Some of our friends who appeared before the committee and some of our friends on the left say that we should resort to that particular provision of the Constitution for the negotiation of these reciprocal agreements. But what has been the result of the efforts along this line?

In the last 100 years there have been negotiated through the treaty-making power of the President 21 of these reciprocal treaties, every one abortive, not a single one of which became effective, and 16 of them failed of ratification by the Senate and the other 5, for one reason or another, failed to become effective. There have been three exceptions to the statement I have made as to the failure of reciprocal treaties to receive ratification by the Senate. One of those treaties was made with Canada and Newfoundland, one with Hawaii, and one with Cuba. The treaty with Cuba is the only one remaining in effect at this time.

So I say that during the entire previous history of this country, only one reciprocal trade agreement or treaty, requiring the ratification of the United States Senate, is now in operation, and only three have ever been in operation.

Under two previous acts passed by this Congress—and by the way, under Republican rule—where the authority was granted to the Executive to make reciprocal trade agreements without reference to the Senate or to Congress, there were successfully negotiated, under one of such acts, 13 Executive agreements, and under the other 9 such agreements.

These provisions of these acts were later repealed by subsequent tariff acts, but this shows the workability of a policy of trade agreements negotiated by the Executive without having to come back either to Congress or to the Senate for ratification.

And it also shows conclusively that the effort to make reciprocal trade treaties requiring the ratification of the Senate is absolutely futile and unworkable.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include at the end of my remarks the statement furnished by the United States Tariff Commission entitled "Regulations of Custom Tariffs in Foreign Countries by the Administrative Government."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This is a list of about 50 countries, showing which countries have executive authority to negotiate and conclude reciprocal trade agreements.

I think that my friends on the left of this Chamber are departing from the traditional stand of the great Republican Party in opposing this method, in opposing any method, of stimulating these foreign trades, for certainly men high in the ranks of that party have never heretofore taken that attitude.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting, but I think the Republicans have not changed their position. We object to the legislation because it does not provide for hearings of those affected by the agreement. Neither does it provide for ratification by the Senate. Otherwise we are in accord with the legislation proposed today.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I am glad to exempt the gentleman from Minnesota from this broad statement that I made, that the entire Republican membership of the Committee are apparently standing on the proposition of constitutional grounds. The gentleman from Minnesota stated in his remarks that he did not care much about the constitutional question if it raised the tariff. If it did, he would be for it. I think that is his attitude. I will leave the gentleman from Minnesota out of the picture.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. There are other Members, including myself, who are very much opposed to the constitutional provisions of the bill, and we are also opposed to the very principle of it, because it takes authority away from Congress. That is the main basis of the opposition.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is what I said. You are opposed to it on two grounds, constitutionally and economically.

Mr. TREADWAY. And the possibility of injuring American industry. The gentleman ought to include that.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman from Massachusetts can include that in his remarks.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If this is a good proposition—in other words, if this is the right way for us to control our import and export trade to let the President make the agreements, does not the gentleman think that the inevitable and ultimate result will be that the President will make all regulations in relation to the tariff, and the whole matter will be in the President's hands?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is an expression of fear that has characterized our friends on the left.

I do not know, of course, what the future of this country may hold as to tariff policies, but at this time I am not afraid of that proposition.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not reasonable to assume a situation of that kind could not possibly occur unless it worked well? The American people would soon learn, and they would not permit a system of that kind unless it worked favorably.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. For a question.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. To answer the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], the question is, Who will object? The point is, What does the Constitution say about it?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I shall come to the Constitution in a moment, but I want to discuss some of the other questions first. The gentlemen, of course, are protesting against the indictment that they are against the expansion of foreign trade, and yet the very policy they are standing for here today would prevent any such expansion, and I submit that the arguments presented here will bear out that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Has the gentleman any somersault opinions to be put in like those put in here so freely on this side?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I have, but I have not resorted to that method. Certainly there has been a somersault on the left side of this Chamber.

Mr. GIFFORD. On those opinions just read?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Certainly. You are standing today for America self-contained, and I assert again that that is the burden of your argument against this bill. Shall we continue to curtail our wheat crops, plow up our cotton, and kill off our hogs and cattle to limit production to domestic consumption? Are we to limit our apple, lumber, and mining production to the demands of the domestic markets? The gentleman from Massachusetts who just interrupted me, I believe, has not spoken on the bill. He may not share with his colleagues in this sentiment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I decline to yield. I believe in protection to American industries, to American agriculture, and to American mining and lumbering interests, but I believe in a protection that will protect. What advantage is it to the industries of this country to have high protective tariffs if those industries cannot operate? What advantage is it to the laboring element of this country to have these high protective tariffs if they have no jobs? In order to operate industries must have markets, and in order to have markets you must have purchasing power, and in order to have purchasing power you must have employment, and lack of employment is the great trouble with our situation today. The great leader on the minority side yesterday in firing the "Big Bertha" against this bill said:

What advantage would it be to the American workingman if he gains the markets of the world and loses his own job?

Did you ever hear a statement containing such a contradiction of terms? How in the name of Heaven are you going to produce goods to supply the markets of the world unless you have jobs to do that thing? A great deal has been said in this debate about the high wages of American workmen.

Why is it that the American laborer is able to command higher wages than the workers of other countries? First, because he is efficient and he is worthy of the higher wages. In the second place, because of the power and force of organization which compels employers to give him that high wage. If those factors were not present, we could have a protective tariff that could not possibly be scaled by the industries of foreign countries, and yet our own laborers would be receiving just as low wages as they receive in some of the foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to improve not only the home markets, of which we have heard so much, but also the foreign markets, so that we can have the advantage of both the home and foreign markets and put more of our people back to work so that we will have more purchasing power and so that our industries, our agriculture, our mining and lumbering can operate and employ men. That is what we need and that is why we are forced to this so-called "drastic legislation."

I could go further into that, but I do not want to take up too much time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. When I finish my statement I shall be very glad to yield.

What does this bill propose to do? I quote from the bill itself:

For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States or that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the use of the powers herein conferred, is authorized from time to time—

(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

Now he has the power, after he has entered into a trade agreement, to do what? To make modifications of tariff rates, to proclaim modification of import restrictions, or to impose additional import restrictions, but not until he has entered into such trade agreement, has he this power. Someone said in this debate that the President could, overnight, change the tariff rates, but he must first enter into a trade agreement before he shall have the power to modify the rates. He cannot, regardless of the trade agreement, raise rates or lower them within that 50-percent range provided in this bill. I want you to get in your minds the limitation of the 50-percent range within which he can lower or raise tariff rates after he has made a trade agreement.

Our friends, the opponents of this legislation, say that it is unconstitutional. It is my belief that they are not afraid it is unconstitutional. They are afraid that it is constitutional. You will observe that they have spent very little time in reviewing the decisions of the courts upon similar questions which have been raised under the previous tariff acts.

In this connection I want to call your attention to the act of 1890.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Before the gentleman proceeds, would he yield for a question about this act itself?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will; yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should like to ask what existing status, either in the way of law or treaty, is preserved to Cuba by the exception in favor of Cuba on page 3 of the bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Under the reciprocal treaty between this Government and Cuba entered into in 1902 and which became effective in 1903, there was a reciprocal arrangement whereby each was to give a 20-percent preference in duty to the other.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I knew of that arrangement, but I wondered if there was anything else of which the gentleman knew.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That was all that was in contemplation in this bill, I may say to the gentleman from Colorado, the preservation of that treaty in its present form.

Now, on the question of constitutionality, I want to call your attention to the analogy between the powers granted in this bill and those granted in section 3 of the Tariff Act of 1890, the McKinley Tariff Act. Section 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act reads:

That with a view to securing reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles—

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert section 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act in the Record at this point without reading all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January 1892, whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in the view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country, as follows, namely:

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The language in said section 3 is:

Whenever the President shall be satisfied.

In the bill now under consideration the language reads:

The President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are burdening.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 additional minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Again reverting to section 3 of the act of 1890, I read the following:

Whenever the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured—

And so forth—

imposes duties or other exactions upon the agriculture or other products of the United States which in the view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses—

And so forth—

he may deem to be reciprocal, unequal, and unreasonable, he shall have the power by proclamation—

By proclamation! It was not made necessary that it be referred back to the Senate or to the Congress but he had the power by proclamation to put into effect the provisions of the act.

The constitutionality of the act of 1890 was questioned in the case of Field v. Clarke (143 U.S. 649). The question was presented to the Supreme Court of the United States and by that Court decided. The Supreme Court of the United States held that section 3 of the act of 1890 was not unconstitutional. The ground upon which the constitutionality of the act was attacked was that it amounted to a delegation of legislative power and also of treaty-making power. The Supreme Court has consistently held that Congress cannot delegate legislative power; but the Court in this case of Field against Clarke held that that particular section was not a violation of such principle.

The Court held that it was not a delegation of legislative power, nor was it a delegation of the treaty-making power; and certainly there were just as broad grounds for the contention of unconstitutionality of that act as there are for questioning the constitutionality of the bill before us today. I am not going to read from that decision; but, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point certain excerpts from it which I deem pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. In Field against Clark, supra, the Court after reviewing the acts of Congress of 1794, 1798, 1799, 1806, 1810, 1815, 1817, 1828, and 1830, conferring powers upon the President relating to the regulation of foreign commerce, said:

It would seem to be unnecessary to make further reference to acts of Congress to show that the authority conferred upon the President by the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not an entirely new feature in the legislation of Congress, but has the sanction of many precedents in legislation. While some of these precedents are stronger than others, in their application to the case before us, they all show that, in the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government, it is often desirable, if not essential for the protection of the interests of our people, against the unfriendly or discriminating regulations established by foreign governments, in the interests of their people, to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce with other nations. If the decision in the case of the brig Aurora had never been rendered, the practical construction of the Constitution, as given by so many acts of Congress, and embracing almost the entire period of our national existence, should not be overruled, unless upon a conviction that such legislation was clearly incompatible with the supreme law of the land.

In the same decision the Court said further:

"Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it cannot be said that the exercise of such discretion is the making of the law." So, in Locke's appeal (72 Pa. Stat. 491, 498): "To assert that a law is less than a law because it is made to depend on a future event or act, is to rob the legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed or to things future and impossible to fully know." The proper distinction the Court said was this: "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the law-making power and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation." What has been said is equally applicable to the objection that the third section of the act invests the President with treaty-making power. The Court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President.

The McKinley Act was followed in 1897 by the Dingley Tariff Act; and I call attention to section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, without reading it, to insert part of section 3 of the act of 1897 in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries, and their colonies, producing and exporting to this country the following articles: Argols, or crude tartar, or wine lees, crude; brandies, or other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials; champagne and all other sparkling wines; still wines, and vermouth; paintings and statuary; or any of them, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter, to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country, or colony, producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States, or make concessions in favor of the products, or manufactures thereof, which, in the judgment of the President, shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend, during the time of such agreement or concession, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in this act, on such article or articles so exported to the United States from such country or colony, and thereupon and thereafter the duties levied, collected, and paid upon such article or articles shall be as follows, namely:

The President shall have power, and it shall be his duty, whenever he shall be satisfied that any such agreement in this section mentioned is not being fully executed by the government with which it shall have been made, to revoke such suspension and notify such government thereof.

And it is further provided that with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country, or colony of such government, producing and exporting directly or indirectly to the United States coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States, which, in view of the introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, into the United States, as in this act hereinbefore provided for, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, of the products of such country or colony, for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon coffee, tea, and tonquin, tonqua, or tonka beans, and vanilla beans, the products or exports, direct or indirect, from such designated country, as follows:

That for the purpose of equalizing the trade of the United States with foreign countries and their colonies producing and exporting to this country the following articles—

the President be and is hereby authorized as soon as may be after the passage of this act and from time to time thereafter to enter into negotiations with the governments of those countries exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles, or any of them, with a view to the arrangement of commercial agreements in which reciprocal and equivalent concessions may be secured in favor of the products and manufactures of the United States; and whenever the government of any country or colony producing and exporting to the United States the above-mentioned articles or any of them shall enter into a commercial agreement with the United States or make concessions in favor of the products and manufactures thereof which in the judgment of the President shall be reciprocal and equivalent, he shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to suspend during the time of such agreement or concession by proclamation to that effect the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in this act.

A number of courts have recognized the validity of section 3 of the act of 1897. Without referring further to these cases, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert the citations in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The citations are as follows:

Nicholas v. United States (1900) (122 Fed. 892); United States v. Tarter Chemical Co. (1903) (127 Fed. 944); United States v. Julius Wile Bro. & Co. (1904) (130 Fed. 331); United States v. Luyties et al. (1904) (130 Fed. 333); Migliaracca Wine Co. v. United States (1905) (148 Fed. 142); La Manna, Azema & Farnan v. United States (1908) (144 Fed. 683); Mihatocitch, Fletcher & Co. v. United States (1908) (160 Fed. 938).

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Permit me to say that under the power granted the President by the Tariff Act of 1890, to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements, there were negotiated and concluded 13 such agreements, only 1 of which failed, and that failed because of the action of the other country. Twelve of those Executive agreements became effective.

Under the Tariff Act of 1897, nine Executive agreements were entered into and successfully concluded, and all nine agreements became effective.

Later tariff acts repealed these reciprocal provisions, hence the authority for the trade agreements was withdrawn and the agreements themselves, of course, failed.

Next, I call attention to the Payne-Aldrich Act of 1909. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at this point the full text of section 2 of the Tariff Act of 1909.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SEC. 2.—MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM PROVISION

SEC. 2. That from and after March 31, 1910, except as otherwise specially provided for in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the rates of duty prescribed by the schedules and paragraphs of the dutiable list of section 1 of this act, and in addition thereto 25 percent ad valorem; which rates shall constitute the maximum tariff of the United States: Provided, That whenever, after March 31, 1910, and so long thereafter as the President shall be satisfied, in view of the character of the concessions granted by the minimum tariff of the United States, that the government of any foreign country imposes no terms or restrictions, either in the way of tariff rates or provisions, trade or other regulations, charges, exactions, or in any other manner, directly or indirectly, upon the importation into or the sale in such foreign country of any agricultural, manufactured, or other product of the United States, which unduly discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and that such foreign country pays no export bounty or imposes no export duty or prohibition upon the exportation of any article to the United States which unduly discriminates against the United States or the products thereof, and that such foreign country accords to the agricultural, manufactured, or other products of the United States treatment which is reciprocal and equivalent, thereupon and thereafter, upon proclamation to this effect by the President of the United States, all articles when imported into the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), from such foreign country shall, except as otherwise herein provided, be admitted under the terms of the minimum tariff of the United States as prescribed by section 1 of this act. The proclamation issued by the President under the authority hereby conferred and the application of the minimum tariff thereupon may, in accordance with the facts as found by the President, extend to the whole of any foreign country, or may be confined to or exclude from its effect any dependency, colony, or other political subdivision having authority to adopt and enforce tariff legislation, or to impose restrictions or regulations, or to grant concessions upon the exportation or importation of articles which are, or may be, imported into the United States. Whenever the President shall be satisfied that the conditions which led to the issuance of the proclamation hereinbefore authorized no longer exist, he shall issue a proclamation to this effect, and 90 days thereafter the provisions of the maximum tariff shall be applied to the importation of articles from such country. Whenever the provisions of the maximum tariff of the United States shall be applicable to articles imported from any foreign country they shall be applicable to the products of such country, whether imported directly from the country of production or otherwise.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. May I refer to certain parts of this act in my oral discussion? I will explain that section 2 refers to section 1 of the Tariff Act of 1909, which fixed the tariff schedules and the tariff rates. This section 2 provided that in addition to the tariff rate specified in section 1 of the act there should be added a 25 percent ad valorem duty, constituting a maximum tariff rate, and then section 2 provided that the President may under certain conditions apply either the lower or the higher rates; in other words, either the maximum or the minimum.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To what act is the gentleman referring?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This is the Payne-Aldrich Act of 1909.

Mr. Chairman, under section 2 of the Tariff Act of 1909, 134 Presidential proclamations were issued putting into effect provisions of this act, none of which actions by the President was referred back to the Senate or to the Congress for ratification. No one, so far as I know, has ever raised the question of the constitutionality of this provision, and probably they did not do so because of the decisions of the Court construing previous tariff acts, to which attention has been called.

I come next to the act of 1922, the Fordney-McCumber Act, and there for the first time appears the flexible provision, so-called. Section 315 was the flexible provision in the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922. This section corresponds with section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930. Then accompanying these two sections in both acts were two additional sections, namely, in the 1922 act, sections 316 and 317, and in the 1930 act, sections 330 and 338.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert portions of section 336 of the act of 1930, which is almost identical with section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

SEC. 336. EQUALIZATION OF COSTS OF PRODUCTION

(a) Change of classification or duties: In order to put into force and effect the policy of Congress by this act intended, the Commission (1) upon the request of the President, or (2) upon resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, or (3) upon its own motion, or (4) when in the judgment of the Commission there is good and sufficient reason therefor, upon application of any interested party, shall investigate the differences in the costs of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article. In the course of the investigation the Commission shall hold hearings and give reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings. The Commission is authorized to adopt such reasonable procedure and rules and regulations as it deems necessary to execute its functions under this section. The Commission shall report to the President the results of the investigation and its findings with respect to such differences in costs of production. If the Commission finds it shown by the investigation that the duties expressly fixed by statute do not equalize the differences in the costs of production of the domestic article and the like or similar foreign article when produced in the principal competing country, the Commission shall specify in its report such increases or decreases in rates of duty expressly fixed by statute (including any necessary change in classification) as it finds shown by the investigation to be necessary to equalize such differences. In no case shall the total increase or decrease of such rates of duty exceed 50 percent of the rates expressly fixed by statute.

(b) Change to American selling price: If the Commission finds upon any such investigation that such differences cannot be equalized by proceeding as hereinbefore provided, it shall so state in its report to the President and shall specify therein such ad valorem rates of duty based upon the American selling price (as defined in sec. 402 (g) of the domestic article as it finds shown by the investigation to be necessary to equalize such differences. In no case shall the total decrease of such rates of duty exceed 50 percent of the rates expressly fixed by statute, and no such rate shall be increased.

(c) Proclamation by the President: The President shall by proclamation approve the rates of duty and changes in classification and in basis of value specified in any report of the Commission under this section, if in his judgment such rates of duty and changes are shown by such investigation of the Commission to be necessary to equalize such differences in costs of production.

(d) Effective date of rates and changes: Commencing 30 days after the date of any Presidential proclamation of approval, the increased or decreased rates of duty and changes in classification or in basis of value specified in the report of the Commission shall take effect.

(e) Ascertainment of differences in costs of production: In ascertaining under this section the differences in costs of production the Commission shall take into consideration, insofar as it finds it practicable:

(1) In the case of a domestic article: (A) The cost of production as hereinafter in this section defined; (B) transportation costs and other costs incident to delivery to the principal market or markets of the United States for the article; and (C) other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition.

(2) In the case of a foreign article: (A) The cost of production as hereinafter in this section defined, or, if the Commission finds that such cost is not readily ascertainable, the Commission may accept as evidence thereof, or as supplemental thereto, the weighted average of the invoice prices or values for a representative period and/or the average wholesale selling price for a representative period (which price shall be that at which the article is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in the principal market or markets of the principal competing country or countries in the ordinary course of trade and in the usual wholesale quantities in such market or markets); (B) transportation costs and other costs incident to delivery to the principal market or markets of the United States for the article; (C) other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition, including advantages granted to the foreign producers by a government, person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Section 315 provided that the President may upon findings and recommendations presented to him by the United States Tariff Commission raise or lower rates within a range of 50 percent of the schedule as fixed in the Tariff Act. The findings of the Tariff Commission were to be as to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad of the commodities involved. In addition to the mere difference in cost of production at home and abroad the statute provided as follows:

Cost of production as hereinafter in this section defined: (b) Transportation costs and other costs incident to delivery to the principal market or markets of the United States for the article, and (c) other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield for a very short question.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to have the gentleman absolve me from his group that said the Republicans want a self-contained tariff. I am not for this. I am for a competitive tariff and always have been.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I am very glad to absolve the gentleman from Massachusetts from that indictment.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the constitutionality of section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922 was called in question on the ground that it conferred upon the President legislative powers. The Supreme Court, in the case of Hampton & Company v. United States (276 U.S. 394), held that there was no delegation of legislative power and sustained the validity of the act. In this case reference was made and quotations liberally taken from the former case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. 694), sustaining the validity of a previous tariff act upon the same grounds.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert pertinent sections from the Hampton case in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The Court said in part as follows:

The field of Congress involves all and many varieties of legislative action, and Congress has found it frequently necessary to use officers of the executive branch, within defined limits, to secure the exact effect intended by its acts of legislation, by vesting discretion in such officers to make public regulations interpreting a statute and directing the details of its execution, even to the extent of providing for penalizing a breach of such regulations.

The Court also said:

It is conceded by counsel that Congress may use executive officers in the application and enforcement of a policy declared in law by Congress, and authorize such officers in the application of the congressional declaration to enforce it by regulation equivalent to law. But it is said that this never has been permitted to be done where Congress has exercised the power to levy taxes and fix customs duties. The authorities make no such distinction. The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise. If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power. If it is thought wise to vary the customs duties according to changing conditions of production at home and abroad, it may authorize the Chief Executive to carry out this purpose, with the advisory assistance of a tariff commission appointed under congressional authority. This conclusion is amply sustained by a case in which there was no advisory commission furnished the President—a case to which this Court gave the fullest consideration nearly 40 years ago.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I also ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD, without reading, citations from other court decisions relative to section 316 of the Tariff Act of 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The citations are as follows:

SEC. 316, 1922 TARIFF ACT

Frischer & Co., Inc., et al. v. Bakelite Corporation et al. (1930) (39 Fed. (2d) 247), citing Hampton case.
Frischer & Co., Inc., et al. v. Elting (1932) (60 Fed. (2d) 711).
United States v. Sears, Roebuck & Co. (20 C.C.P.A. 301).
United States v. Fox River Butter Co. (1932) (20 C.C.P.A.).

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is almost word for word the same as section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922, and sections 337 and 338 of the act of 1930 are almost the same as sections 316 and 317 of the Tariff Act of 1920.

If I had the time, Mr. Chairman, I should like to call attention more particularly to the similarity in the powers conferred here in this bill and those conferred in section 338 of the Tariff Act of 1930, but I shall only briefly refer to sections 338A, 338B, 338C, 338D, and 338E of the act of 1930, and call attention to the fact that the language is:

The President, when he finds that the public interest will be served, shall, by proclamation, specify and declare new or additional duties.

Certainly, this goes far beyond this particular bill, because the pending bill confines the powers of the President to the modifications of existing duties within a range of 50 percent above or below the rate fixed in the act itself, and section 338 authorizes the President to levy new duties. No one has ever questioned the validity of section 338. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert portions of section 338 in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

SEC. 338. DISCRIMINATION BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES

(a) Additional duties: The President, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, shall by proclamation specify and declare new or additional duties as hereinafter provided upon articles wholly or in part the growth or product of, or imported in a vessel of, any foreign country whenever he shall find as a fact that such country—

(1) Imposes, directly or indirectly, upon the disposition in or transportation in transit through or reexportation from such country of any article wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States any unreasonable charge, exaction, regulation, or limitation which is not equally enforced upon the like articles of every foreign country; or

(2) Discriminates in fact against the commerce of the United States, directly or indirectly, by law or administrative regulation or practice, by or in respect to any customs, tonnage, or port duty, fee, charge, exaction, classification, regulation, condition, restriction, or prohibition, in such manner as to place the commerce of the United States at a disadvantage compared with the commerce of any foreign country.

(b) Exclusion from importation: If at any time the President shall find it to be a fact that any foreign country has not only discriminated against the commerce of the United States, as aforesaid, but has, after the issuance of a proclamation as authorized in subdivision (a) of this section, maintained or increased its said discriminations against the commerce of the United States, the President is hereby authorized, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, to issue a further proclamation directing that such products of said country or such articles imported in its vessels as he shall deem consistent with the public interests shall be excluded from importation into the United States.

(c) Application of proclamation: Any proclamation issued by the President under the authority of this section shall, if he deems it consistent with the interests of the United States, extend to the whole of any foreign country or may be confined to any subdivision or subdivisions thereof; and the President shall, whenever he deems the public interests require, suspend, revoke, supplement, or amend any such proclamation.

(d) Duties to offset commercial disadvantages: Whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country places any burden or disadvantage upon the commerce of the United States by any of the unequal impositions or discriminations aforesaid, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty as he shall determine will offset such burden or disadvantage, not to exceed 50 percent ad valorem or its equivalent, on any products of, or on articles imported in a vessel of, such foreign country; and 30 days after the date of such proclamation there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles enumerated in such proclamation when imported into the United States from such foreign country such new or additional rate or rates of duty; or, in case of articles declared subject to exclusion from importation into the United States under the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section, such articles shall be excluded from importation.

(e) Duties to offset benefits to third country: Whenever the President shall find as a fact that any foreign country imposes any unequal imposition or discrimination as aforesaid upon the commerce of the United States, or that any benefits accrue or are likely to accrue to any industry in any foreign country by reason of any such imposition or discrimination imposed by any foreign country other than the foreign country in which such industry is located, and whenever the President shall determine that any new or additional rate or rates of duty or any prohibition hereinbefore provided for do not effectively remove such imposition or discrimination and that any benefits from any such imposition or discrimination accrue or are likely to accrue to any industry in any foreign country, he shall, when he finds that the public interest will be served thereby, by proclamation specify and declare such new or additional rate or rates of duty upon the articles wholly or in part the growth or product of any such industry as he shall determine will offset such benefits, not to exceed 50 percent ad valorem or its equivalent, upon importation from any foreign country into the United States of such articles; and on and after 30 days after the date of any such proclamation such new or additional rate or rates of duty so specified and declared in such proclamation shall be levied, collected, and paid upon such articles.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown in a somewhat hurried way that there is absolutely no basis for the contention made by our friends on the left that this bill is unconstitutional in that it confers legislative or treaty-making power upon the President of the United States.

Certainly, the cases referred to, if they are carefully studied, will reveal the fact that we are within the holdings of the Court in those cases which upheld the constitutionality of the act of 1890 and the act of 1922.

I want to call attention, hurriedly, to the attitude of our friends, in conclusion, on this question.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the leader of the minority, in his remarks yesterday, took the same stand that others have taken in their arguments before this House, that we should not in any manner go out for foreign trade. But in a speech which he is reported to have delivered on April 17, 1931, in New York City, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is quoted by the Journal of Commerce as follows:

He [referring to Mr. SNELL] pointed out that for many years, on account of our natural resources and by means of a protective tariff, we have artificially maintained a higher standard of living than in other countries, but, he added, we have gone the limit on a tariff, our natural advantages are being depleted, and it will be necessary that the next generation govern its economic standards and conditions more in accord with world-wide conditions than we have in the past. Continuing, he asserted that in this country we have gone the limit of artificial stimulation, and he predicted that in the next few decades living conditions in America and the rest of the world are going to be much nearer the same level than they are today.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman got the understanding from the statement I made yesterday that I am opposed to getting foreign trade, I evidently did not make myself very clear. I am opposed to the method proposed by this bill and not to the ultimate end.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is the only way we can get foreign trade.

Mr. SNELL. That, of course, is a difference of opinion.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This has been demonstrated by an experience covering a period of over 100 years.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Pursuant to unanimous consent granted me, I include the following compilation by the United States Tariff Commission:

Regulation of customs tariffs in foreign countries by administrative action

[This table presents a summary and revision to date of a compilation published by the U. S. Tariff Commission under the above title in 1932. The table shows power over tariff rates delegated by the legislature to the executive branch of the government or which are known to be exercised by administrative action in the different countries. No attempt has been made in this tabulation to interpret indefinite constitutional provisions (such as general-welfare clauses, etc.), under which the Executive might assume authority to restrict or prohibit imports or exports, whether by tariff changes or other means.]

In the countries listed below tariff rates may be changed by the executive branch of the government as noted in columns A to F:

- A. Has the Executive power to change duties without reference to the legislature?
- B. Has the Executive power to change duties provisionally, pending approval by the legislature?
- C. Are treaty rates enforceable by the Executive without reference to the legislature?
- D. Are treaty rates enforceable by the Executive provisionally, pending ratification of the treaty?
- E. Can the Executive change tariff rates without limit as to amount?
- F. Is there a special commission or similar agency to advise on tariff changes?

¹ Although duties may be reduced by as much as 50 percent under commercial agreements, apparently without legislative approval, the Argentine-United Kingdom Treaty of 1933 was submitted for such approval before enforcement.

² To penalize discriminations, duties up to 15 percent ad valorem may be applied on duty-free imports, or duties increased up to 50 percent ad valorem.

³ Previous approval of the principal committee of the legislature is required and, upon demand by one fourth of the members of the committee, the proposal to change tariff rates must be submitted to the legislature for consideration in the regular order of business.

¹⁰ But a recent provisional agreement reducing certain rates was not submitted to the legislature before enforcement.

¹¹ To penalize discriminations, duties up to 15 percent ad valorem may be applied on duty-free imports, and duties may be increased up to 50 percent; to protect national industries, duties may be increased by 35 percent; on articles of first necessity, duties may be reduced by 25 percent; these changes are authorized under the tariff of 1923, and so far as known have not been repealed through later tariff legislation.

¹⁴ In November 1932 the Executive was given authority by the legislature to conclude commercial agreements reducing rates, without the requirement of legislative approval; this authority apparently lapsed July 31, 1933, without having been exercised.

¹⁵ The Executive is authorized to increase or decrease rates, provided that articles of luxury shall be dutiable at higher rates than articles of first necessity or for use of national industries.

¹⁶ The powers indicated were granted to the Machado administration (since overthrown) to expire in May 1934.

¹⁷ Tariff changes must be reported to the legislature.

¹⁸ The Technical Tariff Commission, which apparently has ceased to function since the revolution.

¹⁹ During present emergency only, this power to expire June 30, 1934.

²⁰ But minimum bargaining rates are fixed by Parliament.

²¹ The Executive is also given authority to regulate and prohibit importations.

²² The Executive may increase or reduce rates by as much as 50 percent and 30 percent, respectively.

²³ The Council of State may quadruple legislative rates on a legally specified list of (important) tariff numbers.

²⁵ The authorizations indicated were delegated to the German Government by the President of the Reich, in the exercise of certain extraordinary powers granted him directly by the German constitution.

²⁶ Executive decrees enacting tariff changes must be submitted to the Reichsrat (an upper chamber without legislative power), which can demand their repeal.

²⁹ A permanent commission for study of tariffs and commercial treaties with Minister of Finance as chairman.

³⁰ The Executive is authorized to increase rates by as much as 50 percent in case of discriminations.

³¹ Tariff changes and decrees enforcing commercial agreements and treaty rates must be reported to the legislature.

³² The authority to put into force tariff changes contained in a treaty is contingent upon similar action by the other party to the treaty.

³³ As regards increases in duty (to be made according to need whenever important branches of Hungarian production so require) the Government has the obligation subsequently to restore the statutory rates.

³⁴ Executive power is limited as regards tariff increases on goods from nontreaty states, and retaliatory surtaxes on goods from states discriminating against Italian products.

³⁶ Since 1917, the Executive has been given unqualified authority by Congress to change rates, with the requirement that the exercise of such powers be reported to the legislature in matters relating to the Public Treasury.

³⁷ The Mexican Tariff Commission customarily recommends changes.

³⁸ The administration may exempt a few legally specified articles from all duties, and articles not produced in the Netherlands from the surtaxes effective Jan. 1, 1934.

³⁹ There is a tariff commission.

⁴⁰ In 1932, the Executive readjusted a number of duties, for the declared purpose of protecting certain basic industries.

⁴¹ A tariff revision, to become effective in April 1934, has recently been completed by the Executive with the advice of a congressional committee.

⁴² Changes are reported to the legislature after being made.

⁴³ Increases or reductions are limited to 50 percent of the rate.

⁴⁶ On Feb. 26, 1932, the Portuguese Legislature enacted additional duties, on imports generally, of 20 percent of existing rates, and authorized the Government to increase the additional duties up to 100 percent, or decrease them to 5 percent, with respect to raw materials, machines, and apparatus for Portuguese industries. (See also note 45.)

⁴⁷ But duties may be increased without limit in emergencies, under specified conditions. Import quotas do not require legislative approval.

⁴⁸ The administration has unlimited control of foreign trade.

⁴⁹ Denunciation of existing agreements, if necessary, is included in the grant of authority.

⁵² Tariff changes must be ratified by Parliament within 28 days.

⁵³ There is an import duties advisory committee, which conducts investigations and makes recommendations to the Treasury. The Treasury issues orders changing duties, after consulting the board of trade as to possible effect of the proposed change upon industry.

⁵⁴ Recently tariff changes have been made by Executive decree, without submitting them to the legislature.

⁵⁶ The Executive may exempt from duty, prohibit importations, and increase or decrease rates of duty for reasons which he considers adequate.

⁵⁷ Duties may be reduced 25 percent under commercial agreements. Penalty duties up to 25 percent ad valorem may be applied.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, for 5 days I have not read a line until this morning, nor have I heard any of the arguments made here, nor have I known about them. I did prepare something before these 5 days. I have been with three subcommittees of the Ways and Means Committee. I am not ill; I have had eye trouble. I have not heard what was going on and did not know of it except as I gathered it from others. Until you have had some such trouble you will not realize the handicap it is to stand here and speak.

I am going to read one paragraph, because it is in direct relation to what is before us for consideration today.

The gentleman who just spoke [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL], the gentleman from Washington, one of my colleagues, made a very interesting speech. I will ask you who are lawyers to compare the various legislative propositions in the past, which he discussed, with the proposed law, and you will discover the difference. I am not going to talk about the constitutional question involved.

The Fathers of the Constitution, when they drafted it, provided certain duties incumbent upon the Members of the American Congress. They provided that the President of the United States, who is surrounded by his advisers, should have certain other duties to perform as an Executive.

This is a case where the Executive of the United States is called upon under this bill, without the advice of the Tariff Commission, to exercise a power that may ruin every industry in this country.

I will say this, that if you can find any government that is appealing to us for additional markets, I will be with you as far as I can. I will ask you to read into the Record what I am going to quote.

We have half of the world business in this country. Ninety percent of this business is domestic business done in this country. Of the 10-percent balance, 5 percent of it is on the free list. Consequently, we have only 5 percent at the present time that we are engaged in negotiating, unless we enlarge by foreign trade. If so, it must come in only one way, by pulling down tariff walls. There is no question about that. That is the argument of Mr. Wallace, who says he is going to reduce the tariff on grounds of inefficiency. That was the argument of every man that supported this proposition before the committee.

Now, there is one thing I want to read. Someone handed me this, and I want to say to you that I have a high regard for every member of the committee with whom I am associated. They are able men, and this comes from one of those men, the chairman of our committee. It may be that it has been quoted before in this debate. This statement is so strong that I think it ought to go into the Record. It relates to the Constitution and the Executives, and shows the danger of the provisions of this bill.

He said this:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 23, 1934]

In my opinion we have gone a long way too far already in the centralization of power in the Executive head of the Government. The President of the United States is now Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and with the great concentration of power lodged in him, giving him indirect control over the railroads and the transportation system of the country through the Railroad Commission, control of the air communication by the Radio Commission, control of the navigable streams and water power, control of the finances of the country through the Federal Reserve Board and Farm Loan Board, and now domination over agriculture through the proposed new Farm Board with a $500,000,000 revolving fund, every dollar of which will be expended by appointees of the President, and if this bill is enacted into law he will have the power of life and death over industry, all manufacturing enterprises, and complete autocratic power affecting agriculture.

My friends, this is too dangerous and alarming to contemplate. With all this power vested in the President of the United States, he became a colossus. It is too much power and authority to lodge in any man who ever has been, is now, or ever will be President of the United States. In fact, with all this unrestricted and unlimited power he would be in a better position to overthrow our form of government and proclaim himself king than was the first consul of France, the great Napoleon, when he overthrew the French Government and proclaimed himself Emperor.

It seems that the more power men are given the more they are obsessed with a morbid gluttony for increased power. My friends, it is time to pause and call a halt, to stop, think, look, and listen before we go over the yawning precipice just ahead of us.

Mr. Chairman, who uttered that statement? He is a very able man, a conservative man. He is the chairman of the committee of which I am a member. He made that statement in 1929 to this House—that we were on the verge of an abyss. I did not agree with that, because I voted for that flexible tariff bill. I wish I had time to distinguish some of the decisions from this bill that has been presented to you, but I have not and I do not intend to. You are not going to determine the constitutionality of this bill. You do not care about that particularly, but you do care about preserving your own powers as representatives of the people, as compared with an Executive encroachment. No matter how good, no matter how strong, no matter how able the Executive may be, his action must be determined by his advisers. I voted for the $3,000,000,000 relief fund asked for by the President. I voted for what was called the commodity dollar, for the change in the gold content, because I believed that he was trying to do everything that he could for mortgaged debtors. I had faith in him, and I have not lost that faith, but this is a case where the President of the United States through his advisers is going to determine the efficiency of every industry in the United States. For what purpose? I want to discuss that, more particularly the economic purpose, to show you where these markets may be found if at all. That question was asked of every witness before our committee—where do you expect to find your market, how are you going to get them? By lowering the tariff, by having a new determined efficiency of the farmer, if you please? I represent in my State in part something like 100,000 dairymen, farmers, agriculturalists, and I am interested particularly in their interest, and I shall tell you why, because I believe this bill directly affects them.

In a remark just made, and I tried to catch the remark, the same distinguished chairman evidently has changed his views, which he has a right to do. I have no criticism to offer about that. We have a right to get the best views that we can. Let me say to my friends and colleagues on the Republican side that I sometimes voted on the other side from them. I vote what I believe to be the best interests of my constituents and my own judgment and conscience, and that is all that I am accountable for. In this case I have no uncertainty as to what my duty is. I believe we are just as good friends, I believe we are better friends to the President of the United States on the Republican side of the aisle if we vote against this bill than if we vote for it and give him this power. Of course, he cannot carry out the power. He has to delegate the power always. Congress delegates the power to the President of the United States, and he has to delegate that power to everyone who is to decide on these reductions and tariffs. Secretary Wallace, the only agricultural expert we had with us, said that the reduction in the tariff should be determined by efficiency. We asked where and why and what schedules and with whom he is going to deal, and we ask that question not only of all of the witnesses who came before us—and we had some very able men—I speak particularly of Secretary Hull, who did a highly commendable work in South America. However, this is a question that goes far beyond individuals. It goes to all industry, including farming. I have many manufacturers in my State equally interested, and when you reduce the tariff, what is going to happen? We ask, what is the reduction to be? Who knows? Fifty percent is as far as the bill can go.

Remember this: We joined with the President of the United States in saying that the dollar was too high; that the farmer should not be obliged to pay his debts in a higher-priced dollar than he negotiated. We did that. What has happened? The dollar today is at a discount of 40 percent. We have only a 59-cent dollar, and that is the amount of the tariff for the fellow that had a dollar protection before the change in value, is it not? France is on the gold basis, and she can buy up American dollars and come in here on a 60-cent basis. Take butter. There is a protection of 14 cents on butter for your people and my people. Forty percent discount is what? It brings it down to 9 cents and a fraction. Ah, but then you can go beyond that. Mr. Wallace comes in, as he said, and he is going to put in force his judgment. He can lower it 50 percent more, or the President of the United States can, so that that will cut it down to 5 cents. You have a 14-cent protection on butter today, and it can be brought down 40 percent on account of the devaluation of the dollar, and may further be brought down to 5 cents, as the actual tariff rate. We manufacture cheese up in my country. We make more Swiss cheese than all Switzerland put together. Yet

Switzerland gives to us 95 percent of all of our importations in cheese. Switzerland wants this law passed because she is on the gold standard, and it will put into the United States more Swiss cheese than we have ever had before, possibly on a 3-cent tariff rate, through this bill.

Seven cents is the duty on cheese. Taking off the difference in the value of the coin, you get it down to four and a fraction. That is based upon the present value of the coin in the United States. Switzerland is on the gold basis. Then this bill comes down below to the extent of 50 percent. That brings it to 3 cents. That is what you have to face in this bill. You say the President would not do it. Of course he would not—not purposely. We all have faith in him personally, but he is not going to carry out the terms of the bill. It must be delegated. To whom? We asked that repeatedly. Not to the Tariff Commission. I offered amendment after amendment in the committee: "Will you go to the Tariff Commission and give 60 days' notice to the industry that is to be affected?" The vote was 15 to 10 every time against it. I went further than that and I said, "Will you agree to pass an amendment that there shall be no cancellation of foreign debts", because they are all involved. The vote was 15 to 10 against. Not one amendment was accepted or considered by the committee.

I assisted in drafting two tariff bills, and I voted against the last one.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman expressed great confidence in the Tariff Commission.

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did not the chairman of the Tariff Commission whole-heartedly support this bill and say you need not go further and give the President greater power?

Mr. FREAR. I will say I do not give the power to any man, unless he has something for a basis. When the Tariff Commission finds the difference in the cost of production under the law as between this Government and a foreign government, I expect the President of the United States to be bound by it. But he is not bound in this bill by any finding of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did not the Chairman of the Tariff Commission say—

Mr. FREAR. Oh, the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, who has been held over.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But the gentleman laid great emphasis on his confidence in the Tariff Commission.

Mr. FREAR. The Chairman of the Tariff Commission was there; yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Did he not say it was a matter of utter impossibility to determine costs here and abroad of the production of articles?

Mr. FREAR. If that is the opinion of the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, I am sorry. If that is the opinion of the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, he ought to be removed at once. He has no business to serve there.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I cannot yield. The gentleman knows that.

I say the facts can be ascertained. We had expert after expert; we had a hundred experts with us when we were writing those two tariff bills. They sat with us. I was on six different schedules, three at a time, with different experts. They know the costs abroad. They ought to know. But this bill goes by guesswork? If we leave the Commission out of the picture, what are you going to do then? You are going to reduce the tariff. How far and by whom? Why? What is the limit? The power to change is downward 50 percent. When the flexible tariff was drawn—this may be interesting, if you do not know it; and if you do know it, it is interesting, in any event, to keep it in mind—when the flexible tariff was drawn I voted for it, to give the President power, on the recommendation of the Tariff Commission after its findings, to raise or lower the tariff 50 percent. Between that time, 1922, and the time the next tariff bill was drawn the tariff was raised 32 times, on schedules, by findings of the Tariff Commission. That is the answer. The tariff was lowered five times. Thirty-two times raised and five times lowered. It will be lowered in every case by this bill. That is the presumption from all the statements that have been made.

It has the power to destroy all industry. Who is going to determine what tariff rates agriculture should have out there in Wisconsin? Tell me who is going to say to you that Wisconsin, with 100,000 people who make their livelihood from dairying, shall not be protected? There is to be no hearing. They refused to allow any of the amendments I offered, that notice should be given to the industry affected. If that is not true, it can be denied by anyone on this floor. The vote was 15 to 10.

Mr. HENNEY. Will the gentleman yield, since he has referred to me?

Mr. FREAR. I did not refer to the gentleman by name, but I will yield to him.

Mr. HENNEY. May I ask the gentleman if he really thinks the President has in mind to wreck the dairy industry of Wisconsin?

Mr. FREAR. I do not. That is the answer. I cannot yield further. I do not expect he will, but I say that if Secretary Wallace is delegated, and he is the only witness who appeared on agriculture before our committee, he may be willing to go the 50-percent limit in reductions. He is the one who testified. Apparently he is the one to whom this power will be delegated.

Mr. HENNEY. I should like to say that, after all, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt is President.

Mr. FREAR. Absolutely so; but there are thousands of different rates in the tariff schedules, and the gentleman knows and I know that the President never expects to go through those. He cannot even handle one tenth of the business that is before him today, except through delegation of authority.

Now, my friends, it is important to remember that the United States is the greatest market in the world.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of articles that directly refer to this subject.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ADAIR). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I repeat this is the greatest market in the world. According to statements made by economists before our committee, economists who have a high reputation, 50 percent of all the world's business is done in the United States. That is our market; and 90 percent of that market we reserve for domestic business. As I say, only 5 percent comes in in the shape of tea, coffee, sugar and the various commodities on the free list that come from South American countries. But we have not anything to take from the other European countries, because if you will do me the honor to study over the statistics I have given, and I believe they are absolutely reliable, you will find that there are no markets we can go into.

The gentleman who just talked said he did not believe in America self-contained. You will find that Russia is self-contained. She has been self-contained for years. You will find that Germany, under Hitler, is self-contained—Russia under Stalin, Germany under Hitler. You will find another dictator in Italy. Over half of Europe is under dictatorships today: Spain, Austria, Germany, Italy, Turkey are under dictators, and are self-contained.

I wish I had the time to explain how the United States is situated. We have boasted about our self-sufficiency. We shipped machinery to manufacture shoes to Czechoslovakia and many other countries. We ship all kinds of machinery to other countries to manufacture various things; we sent machinery to Russia. I was there. I know how the thing works. I have been in practically every country in Europe with three exceptions, and I know how the tariff works. I know that in the United States of America we have better living conditions by far than exist in any of the countries in Europe; and it is largely due not to the Republicans—do not mistake that; it is due largely to the American Congress that gradually put up these tariff barriers on trade relations so that goods could not be shipped in from the cheap-labor countries; and that is the reason why in these tariff propositions we should require the Tariff Commission to make a finding. Had the committee accepted my proposal with reference to the flexible-tariff clause, there would have been some justification in giving this tremendous power to the President of the United States; but they did not. I challenge you to study the bill itself to find if my statements are not correct.

I believe I cited Switzerland, in which butter, cheese, and every like industry in the United States is affected. In my State is one of the largest leather industries in the country. What is Russia going to bring to us? I remember that 4 or 5 years ago Russia was put out as the bad boy of all the countries of the world. There appeared before the committee witnesses discussing the coal business; they were going to ship coal from Russia, where they have forced labor; they were going to bring in lumber from Russia; the lumber interests of the State of Washington, the State from which my colleague [Mr. HILL] comes, were complaining about the lumber that was to come from Russia.

Now, my friends, that is the situation that we had because Russia is ready to come in. They say they are self-contained; they do not need our help, but they do like the United States; they said they would rather do business with the United States than with any country except Germany; that we make better machinery than Germany.

What concessions are you going to get from these foreign countries? You are not going to get them from Brazil on her coffee, because that comes in free; they do not need to make any reciprocal relations.

Mr. WOODRUFF. They cannot improve that situation.

Mr. FREAR. Of course not. I want you to do me the courtesy, if you will, of looking at my remarks in the Record with regard to the estimate that is made of Secretary Wallace's qualifications—and I have nothing against Secretary Wallace. He is trying to do the best he can. I want you to read what men say who do know Mr. Wallace, because they have a better understanding of him than I. Read their judgment, for they represent 500,000 dairymen in the United States.

I think one of the most important propositions is to have a finding by the Tariff Commission; and that is what I sought to have done by my amendments, but the amendments were all turned down. First, have a finding by the Tariff Commission; then send out and get the witnesses most interested. We had a hundred witnesses before us every time we drew a tariff bill; and there came near being a veto of the last tariff bill because, while it was designed for the benefit of agriculture, every other interest, from cement to structural steel, got in on it; and that is the reason agriculture did not get the benefit it was expected would result; but notice was sent out to the industries in every case.

Now, I have spoken about amendments. I offered at least half a dozen; and they were offered in sincerity.

It is said by the best economists that the bill before you is so involved with the foreign debt that there is no escape from considering the foreign debts. Are you ready for that? I am not. If you feel that it is a safe plan it is for you to carry that responsibility back to your constituents, because if the foreign debts are canceled, your constituents and mine have got to pay the bonds outstanding on those debts unless we repudiate them as France already has repudiated her debt to us. That is the situation.

There is a philosophy called nationalism. I am a nationalist to the extent of wanting to preserve this Government. Since the war every industry in every country abroad has been changed. We have sent over the machinery. All those countries are self-contained; and I am not fearful of that word. I believe in this country first. Others believed in internationalism. I remember when nearly 16 years ago it was broached to us in this Chamber and we sent our boys abroad to help out internationalism. The agents who had the property and the loans over there were very anxious to have it done; and they are anxious today to get their government loans canceled so as to make their private loans a first liability. Then came the lending of the money—not abroad; the money was loaned to the Allies, but it was largely for munitions and war supplies which were prepared here at home.

That was $11,000,000. I put five amendments into the resolution that was brought in by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury, and I put those in because I did not want an official of the United States, not even the President of the United States, to cancel these debts. There should be no cancelation of debts. There should be no substitution of debts. There should be a limited time and also publicity. These amendments I then offered and they were accepted. No one knows by this bill until the industry is up against it, whether it is agriculture or any other industry, what to expect.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Now, in reference to this nationalism as practiced today, the nationalism that loaned to Germany, that loaned to all these countries of Europe, in order to buy our goods. We thought we were prosperous, but they were paying us with our own money that had been loaned to them by private parties. Of course, you bought certificates. You bought beautiful green certificates. Some of them came from Brazil and some from other countries. They were very beautiful, but you could not get 5 cents on the dollar today for them, and yet they represented many billions of dollars that had been loaned to these countries to buy our goods. We are not doing it any more. It cannot be done any more unless they cancel all these debts.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I understood the gentleman stated that the debt-settlement matter was tied into this bill.

Mr. FREAR. It is according to economists.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Can the gentleman point to any language in the bill that gives the President the authority to act in this way?

Mr. FREAR. I will point to the specific language if the gentleman will point to any place in the entire bill where notice is to be given to the industry that is to be affected by a reduction in the tariff.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. There is no provision.

Mr. FREAR. There is no specific provision, I agree with the gentleman. Every economist that knows the purpose of going abroad to try to get this business that is to come to us can testify that foreign debts are tied up with this matter. If this is not so, why was not some witness put on to the contrary? Why was my amendment defeated?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FREAR. With pleasure.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The bill gives the President certain limited powers. I wish the gentleman would point out where in this bill it authorizes the President to negotiate for the cancelation of our foreign debts.

Mr. FREAR. He is not going to do it in that way. It is going to be in the form of a reciprocal offer. I do not know how far it will be reciprocal, but that will be the form of the offer that will be made, according to these witnesses.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It will have to be something reflected in imports?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HART. The gentleman represents an agricultural State?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. HART. What agricultural products produced by the gentleman's State are now protected?

Mr. FREAR. Butter is protected by 14 cents. If we were not protected by the 14 cents, we would be run out of business by New Zealand and Denmark. I have been over there and I know.

Mr. HART. The gentleman is practically run out of business now.

Mr. FREAR. No. We are keeping those countries out at the present time. The only country importing to any extent now is Switzerland, which is importing some cheese.

Mr. HART. We are producing more butter now than we can consume.

Mr. FREAR. Where are you going to sell this butter?

Mr. HART. You cannot sell it.

Mr. FREAR. Of course you cannot. I mean abroad.

Mr. HART. If our price is low enough, it will finally go abroad.

Mr. FREAR. Sure. If you cut down the price that those poor farmers are trying to subsist on, you may be able to sell some abroad. That is just what you are going to do. You have to come about it in that way by meeting pauper labor.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. After they put our dairy interests out of business, where will they go?

Mr. FREAR. After they get our dairy interests out of the way, then we can pay Denmark's price. Denmark sells to England, which is their logical market, but they have been sending their surplus to us. New Zealand has been sending their butter to us. We cannot compete with New Zealand any more than we can compete with Argentine cattle. Argentina wants a reduction in tariff so that she can get her cattle in here. She already brings in pressed meats and other products.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in New Zealand they have pasturage 12 months in a year. Cattle can graze out doors there 12 months in the year.

Mr. FREAR. Yes. As stated by the gentleman from Minnesota, they have pasturage in New Zealand for 12 months of the year. We have not this advantage in Michigan and in Wisconsin. You may call it self-containment, if you please, but it is nationalism for your own people first, and those are the ones you represent. You are not representing the people abroad.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. EVANS. On the 13th day of this month the New York Journal of Commerce carried a story stating that high official representatives of the administration were at this time negotiating with Mexico and other Latin American countries for the importation of thirty or forty thousand carloads of fresh vegetables to be brought into this country annually, anticipating the enactment of this bill. May I ask the gentleman to express his views as to the effect this may have on the vegetable industry of the United States?

Mr. FREAR. The question was raised a few minutes ago, and the gentleman brings it back to my mind. This tariff question is a sectional question. It has to be a sectional question. It is cotton with the gentlemen from the South. Cotton can be sold abroad. War munitions can be sold abroad at the present time, but by and large this is a sectional question. For the people of California it means that you will be overrun with the peons of Mexico, living as they do, and they will sell their vegetables.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is not the tariff a benefit to the lumber industry of the State of Washington?

Mr. FREAR. Undoubtedly. It is supposed to be; and Mr. Hadley, a very able man, contested the situation of Soviet Russia's sending her lumber over here. Forced labor was said to be the fault in this case. I should like to hear what the gentleman from Washington has to say about this matter.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I may say that we are not anticipating any trouble with the lumber interests as a result of this particular resolution.

However, we have been unable to get much protection for the timber products of the Northwest. Our pulpwood and paper products are on the free list.

Mr. FREAR. May I ask the gentleman this question: Did the gentleman vote for that tariff in the last tariff bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I did. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. That is right, and I congratulate the gentleman, because the gentleman and some others on that side, in my judgment, were right. I believe it is right to protect our home industry, lumber as well as everything else, although it does not now affect my country. It once did very much.

Mr. KNUTSON. Lumber has an excise tax of $3 and a tariff duty of $1, making $4 a thousand. This is 400 percent higher than it ever was under any Democratic tariff bill.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I do not want to take further time, because I know the Committee is interested in the different arguments; but I have with some care prepared what I believe is interesting data on this subject and which, I believe, will be helpful, at any rate at the other end of the Capitol. I would appreciate it if some of you gentlemen who are interested in this question would examine this data, as I am going to put it in the Record along with these few desultory remarks, and I also want to apologize to you because although I was introduced as a sick man I am not that by any means. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, let me say further the reciprocal-relations bill has an attractive title because it implies closer, better relationship with the countries of the world through trade agreements. It proposes to grant unparalleled powers to the Executive with which to trade, and a question repeatedly asked of witnesses was, "Are you afraid to trust the President?" After placing in the hands of the President many billions of dollars for relief of our people and the right to change the value of currency, our country's lifeblood, that also reaches many billions, it is asked what objection can be raised to a harmless measure which proposes only reciprocal relations. As one who unhesitatingly has supported the President's relief program as stated, and granted some emergency powers that were declared at times to be unconstitutional and dangerous, because I believed power to act quickly was imperative and when Congress could not do so the Executive must.

This bill, it is contended, places in the hands of the President the power to destroy not figuratively but actually. He cannot administer its manifold duties, determine the fortunes or fate of those to be sacrificed, and must delegate its powers to subordinates. There can be no dispute as to that last conclusion. What, then, is the danger that makes this bill far more drastic and destructive in its operation than the others?

Two factors in the bill, in the opinions of witnesses and students, are more wide-sweeping and threatening in their possibilities of harm than all others combined. First, is delegation of power to the President, who in turn delegates a like power that immediately concerns the living conditions and affairs of every person in the land. This I have discussed. Recognized constitutional authorities will speak on that side of the question and on the powers so conferred, powers far beyond the scope of ordinary reciprocal relations; but I desire to give a brief picture of the Executive power to disturb and to destroy the present opportunities and living conditions of our people, a power not to be exercised by the Executive because delegated.

A question frequently asked by committee members and of all witnesses was, What countries are to be approached with reciprocal trade relations and what results are expected and what price will be paid? The advantageous benefits or prices must come through reciprocal reduction of tariff rates that imply increased imports. Where can we look for reciprocal favors, and what penalty is invited? Will it be from our war allies? The United States fought a great war in their behalf. At what price and with what result in relations we now know too well. The United States loaned $11,000,000,000 to the Allies for war purposes. That money was raised by high-pressure salesmanship of Liberty bonds to pay American war supplies for the Allies. Its repudiation is a heavy price to pay for reciprocal relations obtained through excessive tax burdens on our own people. But that is internationalism.

The Allies pressed hard to force us into the League of Nations, there to help shoulder Europe's obligations. Another $11,000,000,000 advanced after the war by American international financiers enabled Europe to buy our products, but has left our people holding European and South American I O U's of doubtful value. All disarmament proposals that were to be reciprocal have been flatly rejected. War debts were openly repudiated by France because of refusal to embrace in their terms German reparations and to guarantee French plunder holdings gained by the Versailles Treaty. Are these the nations with which new relations are to be established; and, if so, what, if any, part of the 50-percent war debt remaining is to be wiped out in exchange for their good will? Where are these reciprocal trade relations to be established and at what cost?

Time only permits brief discussion of these subjects, but I am asking the question where else reciprocal relations of value are to be had. Convincing evidence presented to the committee clearly indicates that nowhere in the world are reciprocal benefits to be had, but, on the contrary, threats of grave, wide-sweeping economic losses are likely to be involved.

During my service in the House I have actively engaged in framing two tariff bills, first the Fordney bill, and, second, that prepared during the chairmanship of Mr. Hawley. This is mentioned to explain some knowledge of tariff-making methods. In that work the Tariff Commission has ever been a close adviser of the Ways and Means Committee. Subcommittees that conduct actual rate making always call to their aid tariff experts from the Tariff Commission who are familiar with the schedules on which each member is specially called upon to act.

Tariff experts are not entirely relied upon in tariff making, but without the Tariff Commission's aid it would be futile to determine the difference in cost of production here and abroad. That is ordinarily the basis of tariff making, because protection to industries, whether agriculture or manufacturing, has been a large factor, if not the keynote of American prosperity. Personal service on different subcommittees with Hawley, of Oregon, Houghton, of New York, Aldrich, of Rhode Island, and Hadley, of Washington, was valuable training in rate making, as was contact with many tariff experts and committeemen of national tariff fame.

A dozen years ago we discovered that tariff rates could not be changed even under differing conditions without changing general tariff provisions covering many rates that required action by the House, Senate, and President. Every industry in a general revision demands of Congress a practical embargo, and opposing importers always seek to obtain the lowest custom rates to be had. This experience led to what is called the flexible tariff law, section 336, which provides that the President, on the advice of the Tariff Commission, may by proclamation increase or reduce tariff rates that have been fixed by Congress, but only within a 50-percent limit above or below.

No means to remove dutiable articles to the free list or the reverse has yet been devised or has been delegated to the Executive. This is an important part of tariff machinery, because the free list covers many hundreds of items, usually of articles not produced in this country.

Every Member of Congress realizes the weaknesses of our cumbersome tariff-making machinery compared with that of other countries where a commission or premier usually is empowered to change rates overnight. For that reason the proposal to extend to the President wider powers in which to negotiate tariff agreements has been heralded by the country as a step forward in removing the depression.

I was one of those first impressed with its quick possibilities for tariff readjustment. It must be borne in mind, however, that this country does not rely on customs for its revenues. If so, instead of placing a duty on competitive articles coming through our ports which are designed more to keep out the competitor than for any other purpose, we would place a duty on coffee and like articles now on the free list that are required by American consumers to be imported.

Our tariff is used to protect domestic industries, including agriculture and manufacturers from the ruinous competition of cheap foreign labor and poor living conditions generally found abroad. All this has close relation to the bill before us which gives the President power to expand our foreign markets and maintain a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, and so forth, "by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States."

The admission of every branch of agricultural products into the United States is thus contemplated by the bill. Where, how, and when? The preamble sounds attractive, but every witness before our committee in support of the bill refused or failed to say where, how, or when that tariff change was to occur under the bill, and in no case was any definite promise given of specific advantages to be gained by our people. So far as the bill goes, it ignores the Tariff Commission. It gives the President power to cut the present tariff duties 50 percent in this search for reciprocal trade among nations of the world, all of which have cheaper and lower labor and living conditions. No notice is given to any industry under the bill of proposed changes and no hearings are to be given of threatened changes.

The President, through unknown advisers, without knowledge on the part of industries most interested, may plunge any business into disaster. Not willfully, not intentionally on the part of the President, but through inexperienced and blundering advisers whose judgment necessarily must be acted upon in this form of tariff making. That result is not alone a possibility but I firmly believe a probability that would be disastrous.

Under existing law, the President awaits a finding by the Tariff Commission on proposed changes when acting under the flexible tariff that frequently requires several months of investigation by experts, but under this new proposal the President, time, and tide wait for no man.

Manufacturing, agriculture, mining, dairy products all will be subjected to uncertainty in which the tariffs that now protect them with comparatively good living conditions, high wages, safe surroundings, and opportunities found nowhere else in the world are to be exchanged for a dancing will-o'-the-wisp. This might be cured or prevented under ordinary tariff practice, but those charged with the passage of this bill, prepared not by Congress but by unknown influences, will press the bill for passage without any protecting amendments. This has been the experience in committee, and is certain to have like action in the House.

I first advised my Republican colleagues that I did not expect to join in a minority report because with certain proper amendments I might vote for the bill. These amendments were to give notice to interested parties of hearings where desired and knowledge by the Tariff Commission of proposed changes. Only after these protecting amendments were all rejected by the committee and danger to agriculture and every other industry from the workings of the bill disclosed did I unhesitatingly join its opponents.

I expect to present and discuss these proposed amendments for your consideration, and challenge any member of the committee to point out why they were rejected and why they are unfair. On the contrary, their acceptance, based upon the testimony before our committee would offer many reasons that should compel that action.

The Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, all cultured, able gentlemen, and their assistants discussed desires, hopes, and wishes, all relating to this bill; but not one of these distinguished men in a single instance, to my recollection, pointed out the avenues through which we were to benefit from throwing down or lowering our tariff barriers, knowing full well that in so doing our markets are thereby opened to the cheap labor conditions and living surroundings of foreign nations.

I will not quote from any prejudiced witness or from any one interested financially in the bill's defeat, but will briefly cite extracts from the hearings contained in testimony of a student familiar with world affairs and world conditions, testimony that was undisputed, convincing to myself and, I believe, to many others, so that it should be a strong influence in determining our judgment upon the bill.

One of the world's recognized students and writers on economics is Samuel Crowther, an American, whose grasp and knowledge of the subject is first worthy of study. His recent fine work, entitled "America Self-Contained", has become world famous and is illuminating in its treatment of world relations in general. I have quoted from that book, several months ago, in relation to other measures to which he had given close study.

His first proposition before our committee, page 4, no. 6, of the hearings, pointed out the danger or disaster from unrestricted power over the life or death of any section of American industry and agriculture given by the proposed bill. The second proposition, assuming all powers were exercised with supreme wisdom—a violent assumption—would the results in trade to America, a self-contained country, help or hurt its prosperity? In other words, are we chasing a visionary rainbow? His third proposition related to trade balances as vastly important in the discussion of relations to our war international debts.

To his first point Chairman DOUGHTON asked if the witness questions the honesty and wisdom of the President, which Crowther smilingly denied. His was a discussion of practical economics and not of rainbow promises. On the previous day an example of human fallibility occurred, when 17 of the 24 members of the Ways and Means Committee together with 295 of the 420 Members of the House all violently disagreed with the President on a matter alleged to involve $2,000,000,000; with equal sincerity and possibly equal wisdom, we were divided, the President and his close advisers on the one hand and large House majority of his own party on the other. It was apparent that in the judgment of that large majority the President was ill-advised or not infallible.

Again on the same day in the Senate of the United States a like difference of sentiment was disclosed by 88 Senators who, irrespective of political views, did not hesitate to disagree with the President on a great waterway proposal in which I believed the President's judgment was right, but therein lies the challenge by any supreme wisdom made by Crowther when Congress charged with legislative responsibility and representing every part of the country disagrees squarely with a Chief Magistrate to whom this bill would give all power to be exercised and administered by ordinary human beings subject to political and local prejudices found among mankind in general.

I am not disposed to criticize or question the high purposes of President Roosevelt. On the contrary, I believe his fearless and forceful handling of governmental affairs challenges the confidence and respect of the American people and of the world. Mistakes have been made and will be made hereafter, but as soon as determined they are corrected, to use his own comprehensive words his "batting average" has been good. If he has made appointments of inefficient men, presumably upon the advice and political pressure of others, he has not hesitated to clean house and in the main his appointees and advisers have been strong, able, and independent men though often new to the business, men who faced their problems with determination and confidence borne of high character rather than previous experience.

Carping or political criticism has been singularly absent with the great mass of our people who in their distress have placed their faith in him and his policies. However much individuals may differ in judgment, I believe I speak their continued confidence in his efforts to meet the greatest economic crisis in world history. In this I am speaking my individual judgment and have no apologies to offer for that judgment or the support given his relief efforts.

A superman, as wise as Solomon and as powerful, must, however, act through human agencies, and in that particularly lies the danger with the power conferred in this bill, innocently to wreck or destroy agriculture and other industries through careless tariff juggling. Is the experience worth that great risk? Crowther gave further light on this critical experiment when, on page 17 of the hearings, no. 6, he stated an undisputed fact that in the United States 120,000,000 people do one half of the business of the world, a world that contains upwards of 4,000,000,000 people. That is our market land of promise which the world in general will be glad to divide with us. A world that has lower standards of living, cheaper labor, and little to give in exchange because of those conditions. What then is to be the prize that will be won by the bill?

To get the real picture of world economic business and trades let me offer a statement from Crowther's studies that is more illuminating than all hopes and prayers based on impossible conditions—

WHAT IF ANY RELATION HAVE EXPORTS TO OUR PROSPERITY

Secretary Hull has given to you the excellent Adam Smith doctrine that nations prosper by exchange of wealth. That is true to a degree * * *. It has been discovered now that manufacturing is not a secret but that machinery may be bought and a factory be set up almost anywhere * * *. While the raw material nations of the world have been going into manufacturing the manufacturing nations have been going into raising their own foods * * * the reason for the old international trade has largely vanished. That change is permanent. The export trade of the world is going the way of the whaling trade and there is just as much chance of restoring it as of restoring the whaling trade * * * and worldwide use of sperm oil (or return to the horse-and-buggy age) * * *.

The dependence of the nations of the world upon foreign trade during the period 1927-29 is truly extraordinary. During this period the average annual exports of Great Britain, Germany, Japan amounts to 20 percent of their national income. The percentage for France is 22; for Belgium 55; for Italy 15; for Czechoslovakia 33. For the Latin-American countries, which mostly export raw materials, the percentages are, Argentina 34; Brazil 25; Chili (nitrates) 35; Cuba (sugar) 65; and Mexico 35. In vivid contrast is the United States in which our very large exports during the same period amounted only to 6 percent of our national income and if intercompany relationship were eliminated * * * probably not much more than 3 percent. About one tenth of the average in world exports.

On page after page we learn how this country has become self-contained and what it means industrially and agriculturally. Any large imports of their products will naturally disturb our own economic world and a gradual-like change with other governments is noted. That explains why no witnesses could point to any large field of exports to be developed by this bill and why such fields do not exist. It also explains why America self contained is best able to meet world conditions than any other country and prosperity lies not in green pastures beyond the fence but in development of our domestic field. Facts, not theories, do not require any brain trust.

Agriculture is one of the great industries of our country. Where does it come in for any advantages? Argentina is referred to as a country that might be accredited in this bill. Agriculture is its leading industry. The same is true of Canada. Cattle of more than 700 pounds now pay 3 cents per pound to enter our markets; beef and meats, frozen, pay 6 cents per pound; lamb, frozen, 7 cents per pound; butter, 14 cents per pound; cheese, 7 cents per pound; eggs, 10 cents per pound; wheat, 42 cents per bushel; potatoes, tomatoes, and a hundred other vegetables and several hundred articles on the agricultural schedule are at various rates that must be paid by the foreign producer. All these are subject to 50 percent reduction under this bill, providing Secretary Wallace or the advisers decide that under this bill reciprocal relations exist between these countries on agriculture. If on coffee, rubber, and other articles on the free list nothing can possibly be gained, because there is nothing to yield from the free list. Every farmer would protest against any entry of articles that compete with his products and through a reduction in tariff rates.

What is true of agriculture affects practically every other industry. Secretary of Agriculture Wallace before our committee says, page 46 of the hearings:

Those (Americans) who are so inefficient that they cannot meet foreign competition would, in case the powers of this bill were exercised to lower the tariff, be perhaps unfavorably affected.

New Zealand's butter importations were reduced 75 percent from 1929 to 1932, Denmark's competition was reduced over 80 percent during the same period, and Canada's importations were reduced 60 percent, all to a negligible figure, through aid of our tariff barriers. Cheese was reduced from Canada 85 percent during that same period, but increased with Switzerland, that sends 95 percent of the cheese imports. What will these new tariff manipulations offer to the great dairy interests of my State when reducing tariffs of supposedly "inefficient" home producers are asked in exchange for foreign reciprocal relations. For reasons not hard to find, it is certain the 100,000 dairymen and a great majority of the industrialists in my State will prefer to trust tariff rates to the experienced Commission, rather than to Secretary Wallace or other experimental theorists. These I represent.

Again Secretary Wallace says "perhaps four or five millions are in * * * branches of agriculture that would be affected because all tariffs were removed." If so those inefficient in the judgment of Wallace—and so unable to compete with Argentina or Canada or industrialists in any other country—among the 5,000,000 farmers would perhaps be unfavorably affected by 50-percent reductions or any lower rates in agricultural imports. Not perhaps but with certainty would be destroyed.

More confidence might be placed in the judgment of this Presidential adviser but for the recent killing of 6,000,000 hogs before breakfast, many of them used for fertilizer, or leases to ten to fifteen million acres of wheat land during his lunch hour in an experimental reduction of surplus products. Other new tariff advisers are equally distrusted.

On learning of the unrestricted powers conferred through the bill I offered this amendment to prevent injury to inefficient American farmers who might be caught unaware by any secret tariff reduction decisions made on farm products.

No reduction in rates of duties on any agricultural product shall be entered into by the President affecting any article produced in this country until and after report received from the Tariff Commission that all importations during the preceding calendar year did not exceed 10 percent of the volume required for domestic use.

If any domestic agricultural product is subjected to 10 percent importations it would ordinarily ruin those engaged in that particular line of agriculture and it was for their protection this amendment was offered. It was rejected by a vote of 15 disciples of Thomas Jefferson but supported by 10 members of the committee who believed in the protective-tariff principle.

Again I offered an amendment on the general scope of the bill that the powers conferred on the President are to be authorized—

After public notice is given by the President to the Tariff Commission of such purpose.

This notice, it was intended, should be conveyed by the Tariff Commission to the industries most concerned in proposed tariff changes. It certainly was a proper proceeding, to prevent surprising and serious disturbance to that industry. This amendment in like manner was rejected by a vote of 15 to 10, which in effect prevents any assurance of public knowledge of changes in tariffs that may be made under authority conferred by the bill.

In an effort to secure support of 15 defenders of the faith in a sweeping bill placed before them for rubber-stamp approval I offered another amendment which provided that the President's authority to reduce tariff rates 50 percent after the words "free list" in line 23, should be exercised—

Provided, That at least 60 days prior to the President's proclamation public notice shall be given by the Tariff Commission of the proposed proclamation and all protests against said proposal shall be laid before the President by the Commission within 48 hours after their receipt.

The President would thus be advised that any supposedly inefficient farmer or industrialist interested in keeping three meals a day on the table for his family and ordinary comforts of living who was possibly forgotten by Secretary

Wallace or other unknown tariff advisers of inefficiency might save the farmer from disaster, but again by a vote of 15 to 10 my amendment to give 60 days' notice was rejected.

Again I offered an amendment that—

Prior to the proclamation 60 days' public notice shall be given by the Tariff Commission to industries to be affected by any proposed change in tariff rates.

Even a culprit is entitled to notice of the day set for his execution, but again the result was 15 hands raised high, outnumbering the 10 good and true defenders of the publicity provision. Nowhere is publicity written into the bill and these and other amendments offered in committee were all rejected. Keeping in mind that not one of these amendments prevented the President from executing the inefficient producer without delay, nothing interfered with his control. He could act in every case without hindrance or without advice. No argument on constitutional rights, delegation of authority, or other persuasive reasoning occurred. The President's powers were here conceded without question, but it was urged that the factory most concerned or the inefficient farmer selected for sacrifice should, in fairness, know in advance when the fatal blow was to be struck. Not that it would be wielded personally, but possibly innocently by those who did not realize the full effect of their decision.

They could properly learn the exact situation by publicity instead of secrecy and this was the prayer expressed by the various proposed amendments, none of which were accepted.

In the Senate—where gag rules and broken gavels are a rarity—it may be that amendments of this character will be accepted, but in the House committee thumbs were turned down for the sacrifice which is seemingly sure to follow.

Before extending this discussion to another equally important effect of this bill, may I briefly present the picture thus far placed before Congress by the unnamed authorities of the bill. Under existing law the President may change tariff rates within the 50-percent reduction after he has received a report thereon from the Tariff Commission. Under the bill as drafted no action or knowledge need be had by the Tariff Commission. No knowledge or notice is to be had by the American industry to be sacrificed because inefficient or to be thrown into competition with cheap labor of foreign lands. No knowledge of rate making nor interest in comparative living conditions or difference in cost of production here and abroad is required. Experiments, not premeditated design, constitute a danger signal that was sought to be avoided by these amendments.

No witness was called to dispute or answer witness Crowther, previously mentioned in this discussion. His thorough knowledge of the entire subject has not been approached by any or all of the witnesses combined, in my judgment. That he was unprejudiced and sought to prevent serious injury to our own people was the belief of many members of the committee, who paid him high compliment on the hearing for his fair, square, nonevasive answers and logical, convincing statements of fact.

A master of the subject of world economics, foreign trade, foreign relations and certain effect of the bill before us was evidenced and he gave convincing replies and reasons not disputed by any witnesses that might have been called thereafter to dispute his statements or arguments.

Chairman O'Brien, of the Tariff Commission, who gave lukewarm support to the bill, sat close to Mr. Crowther during his testimony. Neither the chairman nor Assistant Secretary Sayre, the supposed author of the bill, ventured any reply to Crowther, although like the committee they were attentive listeners to a fairly long and comprehensive examination of the witness, who disarmed his questioners by frankness and general knowledge of the subject. Giving abundant reasons for his own knowledge he asked repeatedly a question which must come to every Member and was presented to other witnesses when he inquired where the foreign markets that are to be had which will afford more than trivial relief for our few exports. How will they be paid for by a bankrupt world, either by exchange of goods or by payment of money, without doing irreparable damage to our home industries? On the contrary, he urged repeatedly that development of our domestic market, the greatest in the world, was the proper direction for any increased production and no tariff experiments by other professionals or amateurs would reach any result with certain disaster to American industries.

Committeemen juggle the words "and internationalists." There need be no confusion. Washington warned against foreign entanglements. The World War and waste of billions of American dollars in war and business came through internationalists. Neither extreme need be followed; but, if so, I prefer the term "nationalists" as one who loves his own country best. If that be isolation, experience shows we need more of it than in the recent past.

Every country is becoming self-contained and every country without exception is on a lower living scale than ours. Experimenting in tariff juggling and foreign imports was certain to displace our own goods with increase in domestic unemployment. Neither before nor after Crowther's evidence did a single witness point to any country that offered any fields for our exports. Surely, if to be had beyond present trade relations, the committee responsible for this bill's passage was entitled to know what territory would be opened up. With American industries and a Commerce Department now combing the world for customers, not one of any importance could be named for this tremendous delegation of power that would throw down tariff barriers, for what?

How were foreign countries to pay their $11,000,000,000 in foreign debts, except by goods, and by what kind of goods without injury to our own people? When the debt-settlement resolution was before the Ways and Means Committee, sent to it by President Harding, it gave Secretary Mellon sole power to conduct debt settlements. I asked Mr. Mellon why that enormous power was given to him individually, and if he should die or be removed who would conduct settlements. Several amendments to his resolution were then offered, which the committee adopted in whole or in part. One of these provided that a commission instead of the Secretary should conduct negotiations for debt settlements. Second, that no power to cancel debts or substitute securities should be, or was given, and publicity should be given the negotiations and a limit of 2 years in which to act.

In this bill there is a proposal to place all American industries under the control of the President acting through agencies of his own selection. That power he may have now under the various acts we have given him in this emergency, but to give supreme control over tariff reductions through experimenting agents he may appoint is to give power to destroy instead of to create more powers.

Power is carried in this bill to cancel debt payments of $11,000,000,000 without any action of Congress. In case of change in the Executive by death or otherwise, who will administer this unrestricted power?

FOREIGN DEBT CANCELATIONS

A new chapter in the $11,000,000,000 war-debt situation is to be written. This is not a threat, but apparently a certainty. Mr. Crowther, in his illuminating work on present world situation, sets forth: "If the burden of the war debts be shifted to the American taxpayers, ours will be the highest taxed nation on earth and consequently our production costs will be the highest unless we cut our standards of living to the bone. Until such cuts are made we cannot expect to export any quantity of raw materials or manufactured goods" (p. 226).

This prospect is brought squarely before us now. Fifteen years ago we loaned the Allies $11,000,000,000 of American taxpayers' money or about $100 per capita. It was used largely to pay American munition makers for war supplies furnished the Allies after the Allies' credit had been exhausted.

Our entrance into the war became necessary and this Government spent $25,000,000,000 more for our war expenditures in order to make the world safe for democracy, that in Europe is half ruled by dictatorships, the antithesis of democracy. That was our part of the bargain. Of $300,000,000 now due on European debt-settlement terms less than 3 cents on the dollar was paid according to the best information in 1933. Bringing down to date our experience in the role of world peacemaker, probably $30,000,000,000 have been spent by these same allies since the war for armament with which to kill each other, with repudiation the reward.

Scheduled annual European payments on war debts due the United States in 1933 reached only 4.1 percent of Great Britain's budget, only 2 percent of the French budget, and only 1.4 percent of Italy's budget. These three debtors owe this Government over 90 percent of the total $11,000,000,000 defaulted war debts. Why did they default?

Another picture. Great Britain is spending 13 percent of her annual budget for armament; France, 27 percent of her budget for armament, or 13 times her pledged debt; and Italy, 33 percent, or one third of her budget for armament, or 25 times her debt pledged to us. These figures by Samuel Crowther in America Self-Contained, if accurate, give an example of national ingratitude and repudiation by our allies, caused in part by insane preparedness against each other, all fruit of the last war and early seed sown for another war. Debt reductions, cancelation, and another alliance in Europe will again be urged by war lords.

We now come to the bill before us, and I am not repeating the frequent unsupported charge that cancelation of war debts strongly urged by internationalists is soon to be urged onto this administration. Let us, however, get the facts straight. Quoting from the hearings:

MR. FREAR. * * * Now, Mr. Crowther, your statement is, as I understand it, that foreign debts are bound up in foreign trade and exchange?

MR. CROWTHER. That is exactly my position.

MR. FREAR. If that is the case, it is in your judgment impossible to enlarge upon this foreign trade without considering these foreign debts.

MR. CROWTHER. I cannot see any possible way of doing it.

MR. FREAR. And you are opposed to that?

MR. CROWTHER. Yes, sir.

With this evidence before us and constant press reference to debt cancelation efforts to be urged with or without this bill, I offered at the committee hearing prior to reporting the bill the following amendment:

Provided, That no condition shall be involved in such agreement which directly or indirectly involves the cancelation, reduction, or substitution of securities for any portion of the public debt that may be due this Government by either of the parties to the agreement.

The purpose of the amendment is apparent; and because of the uncertainty which exists through the generalizations contained in the bill, it was believed proper to place restrictions upon the administration of the bill equal to those which governed parties to settlement as I have related. As a result, if the amendment had been adopted, it would be notice to all parties interested that no debt cancelation or substitutions would be permitted through these reciprocal agreements.

Without drawing conclusions, it is only necessary to add this proposed amendment, like all others, was defeated by the same vote of 15 to 10, with my party colleagues voting in its favor.

Again I call attention to the comment of Mr. Crowther, which, of course, is a matter of common knowledge that any cancelation of $11,000,000,000 debt due from foreign nations to this Government will place on our Federal Treasury the burden of meeting that same debt through the payment of Liberty bonds and Victory bonds that were issued to our own people at the time loans were made, and thereafter by refunding proposals.

Eleven billion dollars additional tax burden, or practically one half the entire Federal debt, would thus be shifted from foreign governments that received these funds, and would require payment by the taxpayers of the United States. Without discussing the merits of cancelation of foreign debts it is beyond excuse that any subterfuge or secret arrangement under the present provisions of the bill, for such cancelation should be allowed to go unchallenged in addition to sweeping powers that have been given under the bill to control all industries through tariff reductions. This possibility of cancelation of foreign debts is one of the most serious dangers that has confronted our Government in all of the so-called "recovery bills" put together.

Mr. Chairman, as one who has constantly supported the general recovery program, but is opposed to wiping out or radically changing our tariff rates on which American industry has been built up, as well as because of the proposal to wipe out all foreign war indebtedness to the United States, I cannot agree to either proposition. There can be no half-way position upon this bill, for it sweeps aside all protective barriers. It seems incredible that after disastrous experience by our people with foreign governments and with France, particularly mentioned by several witnesses as a possible party to one of these agreements, that we could forget recent history.

The agents of France in this Chamber plead eloquently for aid from this Government when these loans were made. A large portion of the French loan, reaching over a billion dollars, was expended by France in its rehabilitation program. Other portions of the debt were to help France in its efforts to win the war.

France led in the repudiation of its debt among all foreign governments. When it was proposed that reciprocal arrangements might be agreed upon the press reports within 30 days disclosed the French Premier immediately caused tariff rates to be increased by that Government in order to furnish favorable terms by which French imports could be passed into this country. French champagne was heralded by witnesses as one of the desirable French products to import in consideration of favorable terms to producers. This Government then sent over cargoes of apples to trade with France. These were immediately met by high excise taxes that prevented them from passing through the ports, and entire cargoes were reported to have been destroyed for that reason.

Within 1 week 15,000 French marchers were reported to have protested violently against any competitive importations of American turpentine into that country. Such action would be natural if brought into active competition with their domestic products. This illustration is only offered to evidence the bitterness with which every effort to compete with foreign products will be met in such governments and in our own. Trade relations are desired, but not at the expense of disrupting the economic system of the entire country, and that is a proposition squarely faced by this bill unless it is materially and substantially changed. Great Britain, with its Ottawa agreements, is self-contained. Italy, with its African possessions, is self-contained; so is Russia under its system of government.

Under the statement that only 3 percent of our entire business is conducted with foreign governments, or a percentage of less than one quarter of that of any other government, are we now notified that the United States more than any other country in the world is self-contained.

Imports under the free list will continue but juggling or jockeying with tariff rates or with debt settlements all conducted through secret negotiations without notice to the parties most deeply interested and without publicity confronts us in this bill.

Never in recent history has any measure been loaded with more economic and political dynamite than this proposed unreciprocal tariff bill. I do not charge anyone with purpose to destroy. I do say that unrestricted power and inexperience with the tariff structure is practically certain to greatly injure, if not destroy, the dairy farmers who depend upon their protection against New Zealand, Denmark, and other countries through a 14-cent tariff on butter and a 7-cent tariff on Swiss cheese. A 40-percent reduction in dollar value since the tariff law was enacted supplemented by a possibility of a 50-percent further reduction under the proposed law leaves agriculture helpless and in like manner assails practically every industry in the country.

Our duty is first to constituents whom we represent. This sudden proposal to reduce the protective tariff under which all of our industries have grown in search of an impossible foreign trade will create fears for their existence and menace every industry now dependent upon our home market, the greatest in the world. That is my firm belief. What answer is offered to this threatened destruction presented by the bill before us?

Secretary Wallace is the only witness who testified before the committee regarding our agricultural industry. Efficiency is his great argument. It was efficiency that determined the destruction of 1,000,000 little pigs used for fertilizer and 5,000,000 larger hogs that were killed to reduce production. His efficiency judgment determined the necessity of vast expenditure by the American Government in leasing 43 million acres of productive soil from the crop area.

I have no criticism because of this experiment, however impossible and unreasonable it may seem to the average farmer, nor do I claim it is a mistake of the "brain trust", because I believe in the experimentation carried on by the Secretary of Agriculture. He is trying to obtain a fair battling average. It may seem a great many strikes should be called on the batter but time will tell. I do offer the following brief extract from the speech made by Mr. Wallace last week when at Cleveland, Ohio, he demanded a reduction in agricultural tariffs in his experiment to improve the condition of the farmer and repeated his favorite expression of "efficiency."

Mr. Wallace overturns the sage remark of the present Chief Justice of the United States who stated in his aircraft report to President Wilson that "there is no law to punish inefficiency."

Mr. Wallace has discovered that law because he proposes to reduce the existing tariff law to punish that same inefficiency among farmers. I quote from his speech:

WALLACE URGES LOWERING TARIFF

By the Associated Press

CLEVELAND, March 23.—High tariff protection for industries needing it sacrifices the interests of 9 out of 10 persons gainfully employed in this country, Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, last night told the annual meeting of the Cleveland Y.M.C.A.

"I caused an investigation to be made to determine what the effect of lower tariffs would be on American labor. That investigation showed that out of 48,000,000 persons gainfully employed, 5,000,000 would be adversely affected by a tariff reduction. But 7,000,000 would be directly aided by a pick-up in the industries in which they work. The other 36,000,000 would not be directly affected, but would be helped as consumers through lower prices for imported goods."

Mr. Wallace made it clear, however, he would not favor sudden, drastic reduction of tariff schedules, adding that if it became necessary to sacrifice inefficient industries, the Government should treat them as it is treating agriculture today—give them aid until a natural adjustment to lower tariffs is completed.

A new community of interest between industry and agriculture for the welfare of the country was advocated by the Agriculture Secretary as one segment in a scheme to prevent recurrent economic slumps.

That the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture is not considered infallible in judgment is evidenced by the opinion of 500,000 dairymen, including 100,000 dairymen from Wisconsin, who, through their representatives in conference, denounced this agricultural expert who is expected to pass upon the reduction of tariffs and the punishment of inefficient farmers.

Without subscribing to these criticisms of Mr. Wallace, I quote the following:

A.A.A. CHARGED WITH FIXING DAIRY PRICES—COOPERATIVES ASK EARLY RETURN TO ABOLISHED MARKET PACTS—WALLACE CALLED FOE OF DISTRIBUTORS; EAR OF PRESIDENT DENIED

Demand for restoration of milk-marketing agreements canceled by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration after retirement of George Peek as administrator featured a conference yesterday of 109 executives, representing milk producers' cooperatives of 44 States.

The executives also charged Secretary of Agriculture Wallace depressed prices to kill the cooperative movement in this country.

Delegates to the conference, representing more than 500,000 milk producers throughout the country, also revealed complete lack of success in their efforts to reach the ear of President Roosevelt with their demand for removal of five of the economists of the A.A.A. * * *

SPEAKER RAPS ECONOMISTS

In his address to the producers Pike expressed warm admiration for President Roosevelt, but not for the economists of the

A.A.A., some of whom he characterized frankly as "nuts and bums."

Faith in the President is being shattered today among representatives of the agricultural population, he warned, because of the activities of some of the economists, to whom has been delegated his great plans for recovery.

"Delegation of that authority in relation to milk has been our tragedy, and if the President could know the savagery with which his plans have been miscarried and delayed he would weep bitter tears", Pike declared.

"I am attacking, not the President but his detractors within his own organization."

"The cause of milk producers being in a worse fix than a year ago is the failure of Henry A. Wallace. We demand he pay some attention to the counsels of men who for years have been in the business of production and distribution of milk; that he believe we are as socially minded and alive to the needs of economic planning as the immature inexperienced theorists and orthodox economists who surround him and who have led him and us into this awful morass. . . ."

"Where is all this evidence that so many economists and college professors are so eternally competent in administration of either government or business? There are a lot of 'nuts' among them, just as there are among business men and farmers."

The most emphatic and comprehensive answer to the bill for reciprocal relations is contained in the chapter from America Self-Contained, by Samuel Crowther, beginning page 196. It distinguishes between facts and the beautiful faith our distinguished chairman [Mr. DOUGHTON], who believed 4 years ago that the flexible tariff meant the ruination of our Government and the bringing forward of a dictatorship more powerful than that of Napoleon or any other living being, supplemented by his change of viewpoint and reasoning evidenced within the last 30 days, when he asked again with equal faith, "Are we afraid to trust the President in this emergency?" All is worthy of consideration. The President will not act, cannot act, and does not act in these agreements. All are conducted by subordinate individuals to whom he delegates authority. Can anyone believe, in view of the facts, figures, statistics, and reasoning here offered, that either faith in the President or even in any supreme being is likely to affect in the slightest degree the situation as forcibly depicted by changing world economic conditions?

Every government is becoming self-contained due to war experience and home necessities. It is as futile to search for international trade and for trade of the United States of 10 years or even 5 years ago as to expect to return to horse-and-buggy transportation. Every country in the world since the war has fashioned her policy after the example of the United States.

We have boasted so long over our superior civilization, of our higher wages and better living conditions, that, true in part, it has excited the world to follow our example.

This may be the incentive for results shown in Crowther's remarkable compilation of statistics that prove the folly of attempting to do the impossible through any reciprocal relation treaties, aside from tremendous power to be conveyed to men versed partially in statecraft who negotiated these agreements, men not interested in American tariffs or their relation to our domestic prosperity. Under these agencies the bill, without limitation, without restriction of differences in cost of labor and production at home and abroad, or knowledge of the yardstick of the Tariff Commission, are to be given carte blanche in these experimentations.

It is impossible to bring about any return of America's former export business, however greatly we sacrifice our domestic trade. We cannot change our entire system of economic home policy and living conditions any more than we can return to the feudal age.

Crowther, in his practical, logical, and clear-sighted book America Self-Contained, brings this forcibly to our minds. That is developed in the few quotations herewith submitted. I do not expect that it will have the effect in the House that could be hoped for if thoroughly considered, but I do believe its insertion at this time will be helpful in the discussion of the bill at the other end of the Capitol.

The questions repeatedly asked of every witness appearing before our committee was, What country is to furnish the old-time markets for our products. When and where are these reciprocal relations to be made effective in bringing back our export trade? Not one witness pretended to offer any definite answer. As one who has traveled through every country of Europe, with three exceptions, from England to the Urals and from Armenia and Turkey to Finland and the Scandinavian countries, as well as brief trips to the Philippines and the Orient, I confess my inability to find any loophole in the reasoning of Samuel Crowther as found in the following extract from chapter X.

American manufacturers had, for various reasons, been for a long time establishing plants abroad, but between 1860 and 1900 they set up only 42 foreign plants, and a good many of those had to do with the extraction of raw materials. After 1905 the movement grew apace and for 10 years foreign branches or subsidiaries of big American concerns were erected at the rate of from 10 to 20 a year. Then the rate began to jump to over 20 a year, with a high of 43 in 1920. The big drive started in 1927 when again 43 plants were put up, while in 1929 the number was 70 and in 1930 it was 64. As a result, by 1932, United States companies had 711 branches abroad and 1,819 foreign incorporated units, of which 108 were foreign controlled. These plants represent an investment in excess of $2,000,000,000 and employ nearly half a million workmen. Of the plants, 521 are in Canada, 165 in the British Isles, 118 on the continent of Europe, and 59 in Latin America. They comprehend nearly every phase of American industry but with the automotive predominating . . . (p. 196).

The foreign entrepreneurs quickly learned that if they used American methods, they had to pay higher wages; but also they clearly perceived that they need not pay American wages and virtuously announced that large and sudden wage increases would be disturbing. They found the means, through the coddling of American bankers, to get money for their new enterprises and also to refurbish their old ones. An astounding amount of American money was lent to foreign factories that directly competed with products which had formerly been American specialties. These foreign concerns, with great promptness, went into the export business not only against the Americans but against the older exporting nations. The American machinery bought in the first instance was high priced. That did not so much matter while Americans were putting up the money, but when the foreigners had to do their own financing they turned to their own shops to copy the American machines—for a foreign patent owned by an American is only a source of income for foreign lawyers (except in Great Britain and her colonies) unless a foreign concern has been joined in ownership. Here is what happened in shoes, to take only one product. The following letter was written by an American firm which for years had maintained an export trade in shoes:

Practically every country in the world or at least every country with whom we have enjoyed a fairly good business on American-made shoes, is now making shoes of its own. This is the result of exporting shoe machinery into these countries and sending experienced men to teach the natives how to operate it.

A concrete example of this very situation is what is happening today in Mexico, Cuba, and South American and Latin American countries, such as Argentina, Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, and British and Spanish Honduras. These countries are actually making up-to-date shoes in either American or up-to-date European shoe machinery. Cheap labor, compared to our own cost, in each instance the industry is naturally protected with a tariff sufficient to keep out shoes made in the States . . . (pp. 198, 199).

Here is another item:

Depreciated provincial currency is providing a boon for Yunnan Province in South China . . . many articles formerly imported were beyond means of a majority of the Yunnanese and were being replaced by products of local manufacture. Included are flashlight batteries, cigarettes, matches, and hosiery.

Flashlight batteries, locally produced under the direction of a returned American student, are decidedly inferior to the imported, but retail for about one fourth the price of the American battery. Cigarettes are turned out by a local tobacco company operating under the supervision of the Yunnan Educational Bureau, to which accrue the profits. Approximately 500 cases (each containing 50,000 cigarettes) are produced annually. The tobacco, chiefly of Yunnan and Szechuen growth, is of poor quality, but the low retail price, equivalent to 1 American cent for a package of 20 cigarettes, makes them popular.

The development of hydroelectric power has not only cut down the export of coal for power uses but has also brought in the electric furnace and stimulated a vast amount of metallurgical work which formerly had not been feasible on account of the cost of coal. This has hit the international coal and steel trades, for the ability to work metals is an essential to national defense, and the support of the home industry, regardless of cost, becomes a vital national policy. It is the same with nitrates; and today the following countries, which used to depend on Chile, are self-contained as to nitrates: Belgium, Canada, Czechoslovakia, England, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Yugoslavia, the Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United States. Synthetic nitrogen can be cheaply made only on a large scale; the great nations can produce more cheaply than they can import from Chile, but the smaller nations take up the slack of their costs as a matter of national defense policy . . . (p. 201).

The world of international trade is so involved and confused as to make even a reasonably clear picture impossible. Few nations are capable of being self-contained without lowering their standards of living. The United States is the only self-contained Nation on earth, although Russia, properly developed, would be nearly so. The present movement, however, will have to run its course through a complete break-down of money. Out of this will probably emerge a new economic division of nations in which complementary nations will unite.

But the historic international trade has gone forever. There is no longer any reason for it (p. 205).

The large volume of Czechoslovakian shoes which made their appearance in America just after the World War, principally from a manufacturer by the name of Bata of Zlin, Czechoslovakia, has been considerably reduced since the advent of the recent American tariff on imported shoes, and also because of the fact that due to the very low prices for leather and labor in America more low-priced shoes have been made in our own factories.

Until 3 years ago we were able to export a great many shoes to Mexico, but their own manufactures, protected by a very high tariff, have completely cut off this country, and this applies to the other countries mentioned above as well.

As a result of the industrial activity in Japan during 1932, a large number of small manufacturing concerns have been established particularly in the industrial center of Osaka and around Tokyo According to the Tokyo metropolitan police board, the net gain in small factories in Tokyo during the 6 months ended November 1932, totaled 311, while Osaka statistics indicate an increase of approximately 1,000 in that city during 1932. Only about 4,600 additional people, however, were employed by the new factories in Osaka.

Industries showing the greatest increase include metal, machinery, electric, gas manufacturing, printing, dyeing, and spinning. In Osaka the metal-working trade accounted for 246 new plants during the year, and those engaged in work connected with the production of small cast-iron pipe and aluminum utensils increased by 175. There were 83 more small plants producing electric bells and batteries, special mechanics tools, and agricultural instruments, and 39 more producing items used by shipyards and car foundries.

The Japanese Cotton Spinners' Association reports that the number of spindles in its mills throughout Japan increased during 1932 by 472,516, bringing the total to 7,848,494, reported as the greatest advance in any single year since 1923, when additional spindles had to be installed to maintain capacity after the regulations prohibited night work.

Government figures include only factories having 5 or more operatives and a very large number of small organizations of the household type are operated by less than 5 people. Factories having more than 5 operatives, however, increased from 44,590 on January 1, 1932, to 43,881 by the end of the year. This figure compared with 42,008 factories on January 1, 1931, and 39,660 on January 1, 1930 (pp. 200, 201).

The charge, I understand, made in this debate that propaganda opposed to the bill has been maintained by threatened industry, is not serious if true, because any business threatened with heavy loss or possible death may be forgiven in its effort to prevent destruction. On the contrary, there appears the effort of internationalism voiced by the Associated Press that on the day this bill was brought on the floor of the House for discussion gave releases to a long series of telegrams from countries throughout the world where the Associated Press, surrounded by foreign interests desiring to participate in the world's greatest market, gave to friendly reporters abroad their wishes on the subject.

Read in brief, it indicates that practically every country wishes to obtain favored admission to our markets. Nothing could be more responsive to the wishes of interests looking for the finest market in the world. The evidences of such desires that must come about through lowering of American tariffs is shown by this adjoined Associated Press article. No one doubts the truth of these wishes. Internationalism, pure and simple, has found in the American Government, with its generous loaning of American lives and of public or private money, an illustration of the easy methods by which we sacrifice our own interests for Europe and the world at large.

It will be noted, however, that in every case the foreign government interested fails to give any specific evidence of benefits to accrue to the United States from the reciprocal agreements to be had by lowering of our tariff walls. Soviet Russia, Germany, Italy, Poland, Spain, and other countries with their dictatorships, that represent over half the population of Europe, are all closely knit, self-contained governments. Great Britain, with her recent Ottawa Pact, is likewise independent of the world. Our munition makers and cotton growers are welcomed by the hands across the sea, but what are the American people to receive in return? South American countries in like manner look to our markets for their raw products, and in so doing disclose the prospect that awaits America when new manipulators of the American tariff structure succeed under the proposed bill. The following is the article:

COUNTRIES AWAIT UNITED STATES TARIFF MOVE—TRADE-RECOVERY PLANS HELD IN ABEYANCE—NATIONALISM SEEN DYING

NEW YORK, March 23.—Hopeful of a real recovery in international commerce, world-trade centers say the degree of improvement may depend mainly on what sort of moves President Roosevelt makes.

They manifest much interest in his tariff-bargaining program and express the opinion it may be the cornerstone for a revival of world business.

They see the era of economic nationalism drawing to a close and perhaps its replacement by an era of a mutual exchange of products or plain tariff bargaining.

SURVEY WORLD-WIDE

This is shown by a far-flung survey made by the Associated Press through its hundreds of correspondents in all parts of the globe.

Government officials and trade experts in nearly every country were asked to state an opinion on the prospects for an upturn in world business. They were asked particularly to outline what they believe to be the possibilities for increased trade with the United States.

Almost without exception, the replies were emphatic on one point—that President Roosevelt apparently holds the key to a revival of trade, and the programs of many important nations were revealed to be in definite suspense until he puts his plan into operation.

Mr. Roosevelt has requested that Congress grant him tariff-bargaining powers. With these powers he would list two duties for each article of commerce, and would grant the lower of the two duties to any country in exchange for similar concessions for American products.

MANY COURSES MENTIONED

Officials questioned in the survey mentioned many ways of increasing trade, including reciprocity pacts, bargaining for mutual concessions, barter of goods, and exchanges of specified products.

The status of trade in the leading countries and the possibilities for increased trade between the United States and those countries—what the prospects are for revival of American foreign trade—follow:

Russia plans to send a special trade mission to the United States soon to explore the American market. The Soviets, though needing credit, think they hold the whip hand in negotiations for a reciprocal deal, because Russia is no longer so dependent on foreign equipment and machinery.

Americans in France say Mr. Roosevelt's tariff program should greatly stimulate Franco-American business and "is the brightest promise for increased sales in France in years."

All British commercial leaders are watching the moves of Richard Washburn Child, Mr. Roosevelt's European trade ambassador, and see in his visit to London a new maneuver to increase British-American business.

NEW AGREEMENT EXPECTED

German officials expect Mr. Roosevelt to suggest a new commercial agreement calling for reciprocal tariffs, replacing the 1925 treaty, which is subject to denunciation by either country this year.

Italy would like a barter or exchange arrangement, and experts said a deal might be arranged for an exchange of Italian wine and silk for American cotton and films.

Barriers against American exports to Spain could be removed by a bilateral accord settling long-standing differences between the two countries, Spanish and American officials in Spain say.

Turkey's 5-year industrial plan probably will mean a jump in American sales there, especially of machinery.

Switzerland wants a "give-and-take" agreement, and officials suggest an exchange of watches, cheese, liquors, and chocolate for American automobiles and radios.

Argentina specifies the United States take more of its exports, including meats, before there can be more American sales in that country. A new mutual accord is awaited.

GREATER IMPORTS SOUGHT

A Brazilian-American trade agreement is being negotiated, and new American concessions there are anticipated. America buys three times more from Brazil now than it sells there. Americans want a bigger share of the import trade.

Trade with Mexico has jumped, but officials indicate the free-trade zones in Lower California may be closed if and when national industries are founded there. A new trade pact is under way, and mutual concessions are hoped for.

Cubans and Americans are working to revise the 1902 treaty with a new accord. Cubans want preferred treatment for their sugar if they grant sales concessions there to Americans.

Japan is engaged in a great movement for supremacy in certain lines of trade, especially textiles; and the entire world is watching the low-price competition against British, American, and other goods manufactured with higher costs.

The Austrians are so interested in mutually increased commerce with the United States that they have a trade mission in this country at the present time. Austria and Hungary will be aided by Italy under the new tripartite protocols signed in Rome last week, and trade between the three countries will be mutually benefited.

One of the most illuminating statements made before the Ways and Means Committee in the brief hearings had on this bill came from Chairman O'Brien, of the Tariff Commission. The statement was inserted in the record after his testimony and so escaped immediate notice but in that statement he records over 60 specific products which he claims can be raised more efficiently or at a lower cost in other countries than ours, and, in addition, he says there are several hundred others. The inference from that statement, which is taken from page 119 of the hearings before this committee on this bill, indicate that Mr. O'Brien, if called upon to pass judgment on reduction of tariffs on cheese, eggs, tomatoes, fruit, and many other articles specifically named would unhesitatingly reduce the tariff so as to permit other countries to ship their products to the United States.

Bearing in mind that Switzerland and other dairy countries are anxious to get their products into the United States under this unreciprocal tariff bill and thereby undermine the cheese, poultry, and other industries on which the dairy-men and farmers of Wisconsin depend, it is a warning in advance of the scope of this bill. Representatives in Congress having in mind the protection of their constituents who produce some of the items set forth in the list, are thus warned of what will occur if this bill becomes law. I have referred to the fact that under the 7-cent duty on cheese, Switzerland, a gold-standard country, is now shipping 95 percent of all our cheese imports into this country, and if after the reduction of 40 percent in the difference in value of the American dollar and Swiss coin reducing the cheese duty to less than 5 cents, that under the powers given in the bill the President of the United States on advice of Secretary Wallace, O'Brien, and others can reduce the protective duty on cheese, including Swiss, 50 percent, or to less than 3 cents per pound, where the last tariff act, under which Switzerland is now importing 95 percent of our cheese imports under a 7-cent duty.

I do not believe that the cheese factories in my State, which number thousands in the aggregate, including a hundred or more in my own district, will look with favor on a bill that proposes to drive them out of business when brought into competition with the cheaper labor of Switzerland. Eggs, poultry, and vegetables generally will swamp the big cities when these rates are reduced to enable foreign countries to get into our home markets.

No witness has disclosed any particular benefit to our people generally that can be brought by imports into this country from foreign governments to compete with our own domestic products. That will clearly occur under this bill, and I am protesting against its provisions in the name of the dairy people of my own State and the people of all States who will be indirectly injuriously affected by this wholesale reduction in tariff duties without notice, without determining the cost of production here and abroad. It means placing all American industries under the control of a single individual, the President, who delegates that power to his advisers, and has no more active connection with the administration of the law than the average Member of this House. The list submitted by O'Brien, of the Tariff Commission, of products more efficiently manufactured or grown in other countries is herewith attached.

Dutiable articles more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages

Partial list of articles appearing in list no. 9 of the Tariff Commission's report to the Senate in response to Senate Resolution 325, Seventy-second Congress, second session:

Dye, stains, and colors; menthol; olive oil, edible; cosmetics and toilet preparations; China and porcelain ware; graphite; optical instruments; stained or painted glass windows; marble in blocks; manganese ore; tungsten ore; woven-wire cloth; pocket cutlery; safety razors; safety-razor blades; surgical instruments; shotguns; watch movements; cane and beet sugar; wrapper tobacco; filler tobacco; cigarette tobacco; cheese; eggs, oysters; oil cake and oil-cake meal; edible berries; dates; grapes; limes; olives; peaches; almonds; soybeans; beans; peas; tomatoes; cucumbers; eggplant; long-staple cotton; cotton handkerchiefs; flax; crin végétal; carpet wool; silk fabrics; straw hats; brooms; dolls and toys; machine-made laces; hides and skins; women's and children's gloves; sponges; crayons; cameras; and several hundred other articles.

The minority report on delegation of power is so great that I feel justified in offering it as a concluding paragraph to these remarks—

MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. TREADWAY, in behalf of the minority, submitted the following minority views:

SUMMARY OF OBJECTIONS

For the following reasons, among others, the minority are unable to support the bill (H.R. 8687) giving the President the power to fix tariff duties and to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations without public notice or hearing or subsequent ratification thereof by Congress:

1. It delegates to the President discretionary legislative power in tariff making—not simply an administrative power to apply a definite formula laid down in advance by Congress, such as is given under the present flexible tariff provisions—and thereby provides for an unconstitutional delegation of the supreme taxing power of Congress, contrary to what a prominent Democrat has called "the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution."

2. It has no counterpart in past legislation, Republican or Democratic, since in each previous reciprocity measure Congress has either fixed in advance the concessions or retaliations the President might use as a basis for negotiation, or it has reserved the right to both the House and Senate to approve or reject any treaty or agreement entered into by him.

3. Any previous legislation giving the President authority to put a prescribed legislative policy of Congress into effect upon the finding by him that a certain state of facts existed is no precedent for giving him the power under similar conditions to put into effect rates of duty which he himself prescribes.

4. If the expansion of our foreign trade seems desirable, it should be accomplished by existing constitutional means.

5. Although the bill attempts to lend itself a color of constitutionality by a recitation that it is an emergency measure, yet by its own terms it has unlimited life, indicating that it is, and is intended to be, permanent legislation.

6. It contemplates the abandonment of the principle of protection for domestic industry, agriculture, and labor by allowing existing duties to be modified without reference to the difference in cost of production of domestic and foreign articles.

7. It strikes at the very heart of the President's own recovery program, and is wholly inconsistent with it, because any lowering of tariffs such as is scheduled to follow the enactment of the bill will further depress our great agricultural industry thus subjected to foreign competition and will make it impossible for domestic producers operating under industrial codes to compete with the resulting influx of cheap foreign goods produced by the pauper labor of Europe and the Orient, where living standards and production costs are far below those of this country.

8. It places in the hands of the President and those to whom he may delegate his authority the absolute power of life and death over every domestic industry dependent upon tariff protection, and permits the sacrifice of such industries in what will undoubtedly be a futile attempt to expand the export trade of other industries.

9. While no one would question the good faith and high purpose of the President in any action he might take under the powers conferred, such as the determination that a particular industry was not entitled to tariff protection, the fact is that he will not be able personally to give his attention to the negotiations incident to the conclusion of the contemplated trade agreements, but will be compelled to rely upon others whose opinions as to what is for the best interest of the country and the industries affected would not be entitled to the same measure of respect as his own.

10. The bill gives no indication as to what domestic industries may be put upon the auction block in the negotiation of foreign trade agreements, nor were any of the accredited representatives of the administration appearing before the committee willing to give such an indication except in the most general and meaningless terms.

11. It provides no opportunity for domestic industries to be informed or heard with reference to any proposed Presidential tariff changes, even though their very existence is at stake.

12. In view of the apprehension which will constantly exist in the minds of all domestic producers over the possibility that their respective industries may, without notice or hearing, be sacrificed overnight for some alleged or passing advantage to an export product, the bill is not calculated to aid in the restoration and rehabilitation of domestic industry at large but does contain serious possibilities of disastrous consequences.

13. It presumes to give advance congressional approval to any trade agreements into which the President may enter, however injurious may be their effect upon any domestic industry or industries, thus making it impossible for Congress to rescind his authority except by passing new legislation over his veto, which would require a two-thirds vote of each House and would at the same time place this Nation in the position of violating a completed and binding international agreement.

14. Instead of promoting our export trade where possible by such methods as the imposition of countervailing or retaliatory duties on noncompetitive foreign articles now enjoying free entry into the domestic market, such as silk, coffee, tea, rubber, etc., the bill contemplates the granting of tariff concessions on dutiable foreign articles coming into competition with domestic products. The minority feel that instead of destroying branches of domestic agriculture and industry, the two thirds of our imports now coming into this country duty free could well be used as a lever to secure favorable consideration for our exports in world markets.

15. The increased importation of competitive foreign goods will displace equal quantities of our own products, thus adding to the unemployment in the industries so affected and to overproduction.

16. Any hoped for increase in domestic exports as a result of permitting increased foreign imports will be largely illusory, since foreign countries will naturally buy in the cheapest market no matter how much of their goods we import, and unless we can meet world production costs and are prepared to sell at world prices we cannot compete in world markets. For this reason the export trade we might gain will not offset the domestic trade we are bound to lose.

17. Foreign countries in most instances have the advantage in reciprocal bargaining, because their rates are generally known to be "padded" for trading purposes.

18. The bill fails to take account of the changed economic conditions throughout the world as evidenced by the nationalistic policies of all nations and the tendency of the agricultural countries to develop home manufactures and the manufacturing countries to produce so far as possible their own foodstuffs, the result of which has been a drying up of the Old World markets.

19. It holds out the forlorn hope of increased foreign markets for our surplus products in the face of the well-known fact that they can be exchanged only for agricultural and industrial products with which we are already abundantly supplied.

20. The bill overemphasizes the importance of our export trade, the value of which in 1929 was but one tenth that of the total domestic production of movable goods and one seventeenth the amount of the national income. This clearly illustrates the fact that domestic prosperity is more dependent upon the home market than the foreign market, since it consumes 90 percent of what we produce and is responsible for approximately 95 percent of the national income.

21. It ignores the fact that this Nation is the world's richest market, with one half the business of the world being done within its borders. Foreign countries, however, are not insensible to this fact and will be insistent upon participating in this great market with no appreciable return benefit to our own people or home industries.

22. It erroneously presupposes that foreign trade consists of dollar-for-dollar exchange between two nations, when as a matter of common knowledge it follows much the same course as domestic business, each nation selling its surpluses wherever it can find a demand for them, and buying in the cheapest market such articles as it does not produce, all without reference to the balance of trade with any country.

23. It is based upon the false premise that the decline in international trade is the cause, rather than the effect, of the depression. Our own experience shows us that the foreign trade of this country, both in imports and exports, was constantly on the increase up to the time of the 1929 crash.

24. To abandon our present policy of equal tariff treatment for all nations in favor of bilateral concessions to individual countries is a backward step which can only serve to breed further tariff wars and thus result in retaliation and discrimination against our goods in many foreign markets.

DISCUSSION

Here is the tariff bill that if passed by Congress will enable the President, through his advisers without notice or publicity, to change thousands of tariff rates by unreciprocal agreements:

H.R. 8687

A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended by adding at the end of title III the following:

"PART III—PROMOTION OF FOREIGN TRADE

"SEC. 350. (a) For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States (as a means of assisting in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce) by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by affording corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States, the President, whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States or that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the use of the powers herein conferred, is authorized from time to time—

"(1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and

"(2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists. The proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall apply to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of all foreign countries, whether imported directly, or indirectly, except that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the granting of exclusive preferential treatment to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Republic of Cuba: Provided, That the President may suspend the application to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce or because of other acts or policies which in his opinion tend to defeat the purposes set forth in this section; and the proclaimed duties and other import restrictions shall be in effect from and after such time as is specified in the proclamation. The President may at any time terminate any such proclamation in whole or in part.

"(b) As used in this section, the term 'duties and other import restrictions' includes (1) rate and form of import duties and classification of articles, and (2) limitations, prohibitions, charges, and exactions other than duties, imposed on importation or imposed for the regulation of imports."

SEC. 2. (a) Subparagraph (d) of paragraph 369, the last sentence of paragraph 1402, and the provisos to paragraphs 371, 401, 1650, 1687, and 1803 (1) of the Tariff Act of 1930 are repealed. The provisions of section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any article with respect to the importation of which into the United States a foreign trade agreement has been concluded pursuant to this act. The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act with any country which does not grant exclusive preferential duties to the United States with respect to flour.

(b) Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the first act passed by Congress and signed by George Washington was a tariff act. Since then protection to American industry and to American labor has been a national policy. It was established on the principle that this Nation could not build up its industries in the presence of unlimited competition from abroad.

The statesmanship of that day recognized that unrestrained competition among nations must of necessity establish a natural standard of wages. Washington and Jefferson reasoned that a natural standard of wages was the wages of the worst-paid laborers that exist on the face of the globe. One hundred and forty years ago they saw that in the fierce struggle of universal competition—

Those whom the climate enables, or misery forces, or slavery compels to live the worst and produce cheapest will necessarily beat out of the market and starve those whose wages are better.

They saw it as—

A struggle between the working classes of all nations which shall descend first and nearest to the condition of the brutes.

The purpose of H.R. 8687 is to delegate legislative power to the President to fix tariff rates. Such power, if granted, will place the life and death of every industry at the mercy of the "brain trust." It will be an arbitrary power, from which there can be no appeal, no review, regardless of the disaster a blunder in judgment may bring to any group, either of agriculture or industry. To be more specific, the President, under this proposed legislation, will have the power to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries to lower our present tariff rates in return for similar concessions made by them. The plan is to first have the "brain trust" classify our industry and our agriculture each into two groups, namely, the efficient and the inefficient. Those industries in this country that the "brain trust" classifies as inefficient are to be marked for slaughter. These inefficient industries are to be sacrificed to enable foreign countries to supply us with the goods which our so-called "inefficient industries" have heretofore manufactured here at home.

The same procedure under this bill is to be applied to agriculture.

The "brain trust" has laid down a definite rule by which to determine the inefficient industries that are to be proscribed for gradual extinction. The rule provides that all industries on which the present tariff rates exceed 50 percent ad valorem and the articles of which the imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production shall be classed as inefficient. Here are a few of the groups that are under sentence of death by the "brain trust": Chemicals, oils and paints, earth, earthenware and glassware, metals and manufactures of, wood and manufactures of, agricultural products and provisions, spirits, wines, flax, hemp, jute and manufactures of, papers and books.

It is urged by the "brain trust" that any industry that cannot produce and sell goods in this country as cheaply as similar goods can be produced abroad and sold here is an inefficient industry. Furthermore, it is urged by the advocates of this measure that to permit 120,000,000 people to buy in the cheapest market will be to their advantage.

This theory overlooks the fundamental economic fact that the true gain of every country is ample wages to the laborer. The laboring classes are the nation; they are the producers; and they are the greatest consumers. It is their expenditures that have made our own market the greatest and best cash market in the world. Moreover, the "brain trust" ignores the fact that in the fierce struggle of universal competition, extending over the whole earth, the wages of labor must be everywhere beaten down to the worst-paid laborers in the world. The industrious American workman must starve unless he will consent that he and his wife and children shall be as badly fed, clothed, and lodged as the most wretched of his foreign competitors.

To buy in the cheapest foreign market under a rule of unrestricted competition will soon reduce the purchasing power of the United States to the level of that nation which pays the lowest wage.

It was asserted by the advocates in the hearing held on this bill that if each country produced what it is by nature fitted for, industry will everywhere be more productive and everybody will have more. Again, let me repeat that the great mass of labor is the greatest consumer; that under the economic theory advanced in support of this bill the laborer, instead of having more, will be driven to compete with the most wretched competitors, from which it logically follows that he will have less, because his purchasing power will be infinitely less. Furthermore, if our new domestic policy is to be formulated on the theory that the country that can produce the cheapest shall have free access to our market, then it becomes perfectly clear just what branches of agriculture are marked for the revolutionary guillotine.

Let us take up one by one a few of the proscribed inefficient groups:

DAIRY PRODUCTS

I mention the dairy business in the United States because many States quite recently have had some experience with the "brain trust" touching this agricultural activity. The dairy industry, measured with the yardstick of the "brain trust", stands convicted, without trial, without the right of appeal or benefit of clergy, as an inefficient industry. Looking at the different climates and different capabilities of countries, our dairymen cannot compete with the nations which Nature has endowed more highly than our own for raising cattle. Because our dairymen cannot produce butter, cheese, or milk so cheaply as Russia, Brazil, Argentina, New Zealand, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, British India, and Australia these countries should be invited to supply the United States with dairy products, according to the "brain trust." These countries have in the aggregate over 260,000,000 cattle.

Let us take one of the smaller dairy-producing countries. New Zealand is a good example. She is small, estimated to have an area about equal to that of Pennsylvania, Illinois, and half of Rhode Island. She has developed a large export business. I might add that when New Zealand first engaged in the export trade, the foremost British economists in their zeal for free trade assured the British farmers that there could never be any reason for them to fear overseas competition. Now New Zealand, although 11,000 miles from London, places her farm products in the London market at a lower price than the English farmer, located just outside of London, can place a similar product there.

A number of the New Zealand cooperative dairy factories have set up a marketing board in conjunction with the cooperative wholesale society of Great Britain. This board handled in 1 year butter and cheese in excess of $525,000,000 in value.

Although located half way around the world from its chief market, the New Zealand farmer receives on the farm approximately 81 percent of the wholesale price for his butter in London. It is claimed by an American expert that the Wisconsin dairy farmer, located 10 times nearer the market, gets a much smaller proportion of the wholesale price for his produce.

Due to a mild and moist climate the New Zealander can pasture his cattle on luxuriant grass the year round. It has excellent soil, plentiful rainfall, numerous stock-watering creeks and rivers. The summers are never hot enough to burn up the grazing land, and its winters never so cold that stock has to be housed.

New Zealand has excellent internal transportation facilities and low rates. She has 17 natural ports so deep that ocean-going ships can safely come up to the docks.

Government figures show that New Zealand has 900,000 dairy cows in North and South Islands alone. There are fully 27,000,000 acres of land not adapted to grain raising which affords excellent pasture. Liberal aid is given by the government to encourage the dairy industry. Advances are made by the State to dairy companies for the purpose of buying land, erecting buildings, and buying machinery. The debt must be repaid in 15 years. The latest figures I have available show that there are 214 butter factories and 400 cheese factories in operation. The 214 butter factories and 400 cheese factories annually prepare for export 20,000 tons of butter and 60,000 tons of cheese, in addition to the quantities reserved for home consumption. Most factories are equipped to make either butter or cheese as the season or the markets dictate.

New Zealand is watching for new markets for her dairy products. Her land policy was adopted with this in view. Land is divided into three classes. For the first-class lands the sale price is $5 an acre, for the second class not less than $2.50 an acre, and third class not less than $1.25 an acre. The third class is comparable to dairy land in the United States. The holdings are limited to 666 acres of the first class, 2,000 acres of the second class, and 5,000 acres of the third class. The man who leases land with a view to buying has 25 years in which to pay off the debt. The tax laws are framed to help the farmer. Large exemptions are allowed where the farm is mortgaged. Absentee landlords and shareholders in land companies pay 50 percent higher tax than do those who live on the farm.

I have mentioned the dairy industry of this small country and its potential possibilities for expanding the dairy business when and if it can gain access to a larger market. Should the "brain trust" be able through a series of trade agreements to succeed in destroying the 604,837 inefficient dairy farms in our 10 leading dairy States, upon which some 30,000,000 people depend for their livelihood, what a wave of prosperity would sweep over this great country of ours. These families could all emigrate to New Zealand and there produce butter to ship to the United States.

The theory that each country produce what it is by nature best fitted for so that industry will everywhere be more productive, and everybody will have more is only a phantom. Under this theory many countries would cease to produce at all.

At this point, I want to insert a chart to show a list of the countries that have an exportable surplus of butter and cheese. Each or all of these countries is now willing to enter into a trade agreement to exchange its surplus butter or cheese for some of our manufactured goods.

The table is taken from the March 1931 issue of the International Review of Agriculture. I have been unable to get later information.

POULTRY

Why should great trains move across this continent loaded with poultry and eggs to supply the great cities of the Atlantic seaboard? China is the greatest poultry-raising and egg-producing country in the world. Why not let China supply this country with eggs. Our farmers cannot compete with her in price. The "brain trust" knows that China had state poultry farms, and also incubators, 200 years before such a device was known in the United States. The best of Chinese labor for poultry raising can be obtained for 2 or 3 cents an hour. Remove our present tariff rates on eggs and egg products and they can be laid down in our market by China at prices many times below the cost of production in the United States. The egg export business is highly organized in China. Numerous state farms hatch millions of chickens. These small chicks are sent out hundreds of miles from the seaport towns into the interior. Every Chinese family keeps poultry. The hens and the farmers live in the same mud house and occupy the same rooms. Along the roads 200 miles from the seaports can be seen men hurrying along, each with a huge basket in which is packed 5 bushels of eggs. These are delivered to the big egg factories. The eggs are put on endless belts and conveyed to tables, at which are seated hundreds of Chinese girls. On the table in front of each girl is a horizontal knife.

The eggs are removed from the belt and cut in half; then the yolk is thrown into one vat and the white into another. One girl will handle 5,000 eggs in a day. When the vats are filled, the contents of each is churned separately until of the right consistency. Next the yolks are poured onto superheated rollers and revolved until all moisture is driven off. The whites are put on separate rollers. Then the dried eggs are removed from the rollers and immediately packed in tin boxes holding about 120 pounds; these are hermetically sealed ready for export. China exports more eggs than any other nation in the world. Until our tariff act gave protection to our farmers, China supplied many of our bakers and candy makers with egg products.

Measured by the yardstick of the "brain trust", China should supply this country with eggs. Our poultry men should retire from the field.

Some of us do not agree that the poultry industry is inefficient, that in spite of any economic advantage China may possess, the business of the poultry men should not be destroyed to gain some imaginary economic advantage. The poultry industry in the United States at present ranks fourth in the farm value of its products. Its relative place among agricultural commodities is shown, as follows:

Milk	$1, 663, 772, 000
Hogs	1, 354, 030, 000
Corn	1, 258, 313, 000
Chickens	1, 040, 388, 000
Cattle and calves	999, 023, 000

Cotton and cottonseed.....	$790,515,000
Wheat.....	566,231,000
Oats.....	463,708,000
Potatoes, white.....	348,362,000

The value of chickens on hand in the United States, April 1, 1930, has been estimated at $321,624,749. The value of eggs produced in the United States in 1929, including chickens, turkeys, ducks, and geese, was estimated to be $647,725,650. The combined total of the value of the three items, namely, chickens on hand, the value of the eggs produced, and the value of all poultry raised, is $1,768,611,555.

THE WOOLGROWERS

I have a protest against the passage of this bill from the secretary of the Wool Growers Association. The speed with which this measure was introduced, hearings held, and then reported did not give time for the woolgrowers to appear before the Ways and Means Committee to enter protest. Why are they objecting to this bill? They know that under the formula laid down by the "brain trust" the wool producers in the United States come within the group known as "inefficient." The woolgrowers here cannot exist without a high tariff. Other countries are better adapted to raising sheep. Most of the sheep ranges of the United States are on dry and poor land where the pasturage at times burns out or dries up. Why bother about wool when just to the south of us, in Argentina, Buenos Aires is the largest wool market in the world? It is through this market that the wool from 80,000,000 sheep is handled annually. A census shows 10 sheep to each inhabitant in Argentina. Next to Australia, Argentina is the world's largest sheep producer.

The testimony offered at the hearings in support of this bill stressed the potential possibilities of trade with South America. Those who appeared declined to specify the particular products we were to receive in return for our goods. Can it be possible that wool was overlooked?

WHEAT

Wheat has become an inefficient product in the United States. It requires a large protective duty, and it has ceased to be a factor on the world market. It can be grown in other countries at a lower cost.

The "brain trust" knows that from now on the United States cannot compete successfully with those nations where soil, climate, and low-cost labor can produce all that we need in the United States. The dominant factor in reciprocal trade agreements is 120,000,000 consumers in the United States, at least, so we were told by the proponents of this bill.

Here are the facts upon which the "brain trust" can base its conclusions. Until 1890 the United States occupied a highly favorable position in wheat production. Our country was known as "the bread basket of Europe." About 1890 Russia entered the wheat market. She increased wheat production by four times from 1890 to the outbreak of the World War. Canada increased wheat production from 56,000,000 bushels in 1900 to 232,000,000 bushels in 1913. Argentina increased her production by 31,000,000 bushels in the years just preceding the World War. These four countries, with a limited population and an unelastic market, poured their products into the world market. Canada produced 567,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1928. It is upon these facts and the further forecast of the Agricultural Department that a possible wheat area 800,000,000 acres, or perhaps 10 times the present area can be put into production, that the "brain trust" can find wheat growing in the United States an inefficient industry.

Measured by ideal climatic conditions, virgin soil, cheap labor, low transportation costs the "brain trust" can find abundant opportunity to eliminate many groups of American agriculture.

VEGETABLES

It is reported that our Ambassador to Cuba is now investigating conditions there to ascertain what vegetables Cuba could trade for products of the United States. A glance at Cuban exports to the United States during the year 1932 indicates clearly several vegetables that will be offered under a trade agreement:

Exports to United States from Cuba (1932)

	Pounds
Beans, green or in brine.....	3,671,175
Potatoes, white.....	2,031,170
Tomatoes.....	25,559,827

Negotiations are now being had with Mexico to determine on what basis a trade agreement can be made. It has been found that Mexico can ship an additional 20,000 or 30,000 carloads of fresh vegetables annually. Such a trade agreement will tend to depress the price of vegetables in the United States to the great injury of a branch of agriculture that is now suffering from low prices. Tomatoes will be one of the chief products Mexico will have to offer us.

Some years the beet-sugar growers receive for their crop $100,000,000. This money is spent in the United States. It is spent by the 72,000 farmers who receive it. How is it spent? Part of it is paid to 159,000 farm hands, 85 percent of whom are Americans, employed in growing the crop. This supports a local market. The whole $100,000,000 is in reality exchanged for things made or produced in the United States. It constitutes a part of the spendable income of the Nation. This sum of $100,000,000 when spent in the United States feeds, houses, and clothes the workmen and their families and pays the employers.

It does more than this; it creates new markets at home. The sugar-beet growers have created a market for coal, for limerock, for cotton bags, for mill machinery, for railways, for coke, for cotton duck, for farm machinery. These are only a few of the markets created by this one industry. These markets thus created are stable markets close at hand and not subject to the vicissitudes of revolutions, wars, or change in foreign policies. When you wipe out the sugar-beet industry you destroy a series of home markets. A transfer of the pay roll of the sugar-beet industry to Cuba destroys the amount invested in the sugar-beet industry in the United States. You transfer the pay roll to Cubans who may or may not purchase from the United States in as great a volume as the sugar-beet farmers did before they were driven out of business. Assume that the Cubans do purchase just as much in the United States as our beet-sugar men spent here, our Nation has not gained. It has lost by the exchange.

Surely no man can successfully claim that it will make any gain for this country as a whole to transfer this industry and the series of markets it supports to a foreign country. Such a transfer of the sugar industry to Cuba transfers the $100,000,000 our farmers received and spent here at home. Our farmers have $100,000,000 less to spend here; Cuba has it to spend over there.

The disaster does not end when the sugar-beet industry is destroyed. Those who depended on this industry for a livelihood are pauperized and set adrift without a raft to keep them afloat. Oh, but, the advocates of this bill say, let them turn their hands and their capital to some new employment. To find productive employment for our home people in fields not already overcrowded presents a problem of supreme difficulty. It has challenged the attention of statesmen and economists for several thousand years, and no solution has yet been found for it.

There will be no benefit to the consumer by destroying the beet-sugar industry. Once give foreign nations a monopoly of the sugar supply, and the consumers of our country will pay whatever price foreign producers choose to ask. That was proven in 1920. Let us assume for argument that it would reduce the price 2 cents a pound. Would our Nation gain? I say that for every dollar the individual might save our Nation would lose $99 in spendable national income. This is incontrovertible.

It is worth while to examine into the philosophy of those who advocate a measure so far-reaching as the one now before us. The bill must have for its purpose the projecting of a new national policy in harmony with the economic creed of those who urge its enactment. One of the most ardent supporters of this bill is the Secretary of Agriculture. On page 12 of his book, America Must Choose, he states:

If we are going to increase foreign purchasing power enough to sell abroad our normal surplus cotton, wheat, and tobacco at a decent price, we shall have to accept nearly $1,000,000 more goods from abroad than we did in 1929. We shall have to get that much more in order to service our debts that are coming to us from abroad and have enough left over to pay us a fair price for what we send abroad.

It is quite apparent that some of the administration proponents of the bill see in it an instrumentality to sacrifice inefficient domestic industries to enable foreign nations to pay their debts.

Then the Secretary proceeds to be more specific as to the extent he would displace our industries to achieve his international purpose. Following the statement last quoted he proceeds:

This will involve a radical reduction in tariffs. That might seriously hurt certain industries, and a few kinds of agricultural business, such as sugar-beet growing and flax growing. It might also cause pain for a while to woolgrowers and to farmers who supply material for certain edible oils. I think we ought to face that fact. If we are going to lower tariffs radically, there may have to be some definite planning whereby certain industries or businesses will have to be retired. The Government might have to help furnish means for orderly retirement of such businesses and even select those which are thus to be retired.

No group in industry or in agriculture is to have any advance notice as to when or how it is to be retired. Under the terms of the bill, one man, acting upon the advice of the "brain trust", can barter away an industry or an agricultural group with any foreign country for some fantastic or supposed advantage, without an opportunity for these sacrificed groups to be heard or a chance to appeal.

The Secretary of Agriculture warns the farmers that unless they are willing to accept the international doctrine he proclaims, then the only alternative is nationalism. The manner in which he would enforce nationalism is best expressed in his own language. I quote from America Must Choose:

If we finally go all the way toward nationalism, it may be necessary to have compulsory control of marketing, licensing of plowed land, and base and surplus quotas for every farmer for every product for each month in the year. We may have to have Government control of all surpluses, and a far greater degree of public ownership than we have now. It may be necessary to make a public utility out of agriculture and apply to it a combination of an Esch-Cummins Act and an Adamson Act. Every plowed field would have its permit sticking up on its post.

Here is the implied threat that unless the people of this Nation sacrifice their domestic market, which now consumes 90 percent of all that is produced in this country, to foreign nations at the expense of our own industries and our own agriculture, then the Government will be compelled to step in and run the private business of each individual.

Such a delegation of legislative power as is asked for in this bill, if granted, will be the most abject surrender of the fundamental rights of the people that has taken place in the history of the United States. It will place these rights beyond the power of review, recall, or appeal, except by a two-thirds vote of the House and of the Senate.

Every trade agreement entered into will invite international friction and complications. The recent negotiations between Great Britain and Japan looking to a trade agreement has set in motion a train of explosive events, the repercussions of which cannot now be accurately forecast. The machinery now provided in the Federal Constitution is adequate for negotiating and ratifying such treaties as may be necessary without recourse to dictatorial power vested in one man.

You may be interested to know that recently a conference was held at the Department of Agriculture, to which were invited on short notice the tomato growers from all over the country, to see if an agreement could be arranged with the canners to pay a price that would enable growers to realize at least the cost of production for their tomatoes. It is now proposed to enter into a reciprocal trade agreement and flood this country with tomatoes from Mexico and Cuba.

I now call your attention to a list of inefficient industries published in the hearings, and the Members who are interested in small industries and various agricultural groups should review this list.

Mr. TREADWAY. Before the gentleman brings that up, will he designate where the list comes from?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It comes from the reciprocal trade agreements hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, at page 119.

Mr. EVANS. But where did it come from?

Mr. REED of New York. It is furnished by the Tariff Commission and is headed:

Partial list of articles appearing in list no 9 of the Tariff Commission's report to the Senate in response to Senate Resolution 325, Seventy-second Congress, second session.

One of the first is dyes, and others are stains, colors, menthol, woven-wire cloth, pocket cutlery—many towns in my district are supported by cutlery factories, but they are classed here as inefficient.

Safety razors, safety-razor blades, surgical instruments, shotguns, watch movements, cane and beet sugar, cheese, eggs, grapes—there are 30,000 acres of grapes in my district, and we all know how many there are in California and a dozen other States.

Beans, peas, tomatoes, cucumbers, eggplant—we raise eggplant in large volume in our section of the country. Dolls and toys, which the Secretary of Agriculture talked about, stating that Germany would take our lard and we would take their toys.

Cameras—there have been two large industries developed since we put a slight tariff on films.

Practically every Member here comes from a town that has a chamber of commerce. There are some 3,000 or 4,000 of them in the United States. The local people pay dues to their chamber of commerce, and one of the functions of almost every chamber of commerce, whether it is a proper function or not, is to see if a new industry can be developed in the community which it represents. Many of them, after a period of years, have succeeded in rehabilitating some industry in the town or in establishing some new industry or in building up one through the vocational-school system. They are very proud of such local industries.

Of course, such an industry cannot compete with a similar industry in Germany or in some other foreign country. This is utterly impossible, because over there their wages are low and their hours are long; and under the N.R.A. here, what chance would one of these industries have to compete with a similar industry abroad? You are running face-on into a community effort of some three or four thousand communities in the United States when you start out to destroy these little industries which are the lifeblood of many communities.

I see a gentleman sitting over here who comes from a splendid town up in Michigan. The other day he brought in a report from the chamber of commerce, which he presented to me with great pride. I read it. The citizens of this small city were very proud of the fact that they had established another industry to replace one that had failed. This was a record for the town. They had restored the pay roll to the town. The industry so established is vital to this particular community, and this instance can be multiplied 1,000 times over the entire country, and yet the Tariff Commission has listed hundreds of industries that are the lifeblood of the different communities of this country to be destroyed under these reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order to have read a letter from the national commander of the American Legion, and I ask that the Clerk may read this letter which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.
The Clerk read as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
March 27, 1934.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The morning newspapers state that President Roosevelt proposes to veto the independent offices appropriation bill, containing amendments to the veterans' disability laws which incorporate, in substance, three points of the Legion's four-point program.

Inasmuch as the President plans to leave Washington today, it is likely that the House of Representatives will vote upon the veto prior to his departure. In this event, we believe the Congress should understand the points at issue affecting World War disabled, from the viewpoint of the American Legion. There being insufficient time to address a letter to each Member of the House, I would appreciate your securing permission to read this letter from the floor, for the information of the Members.

There were originally three points at issue affecting the disabled. The hospitalization point has already been substantially granted by Presidential regulation, so all that has remained on this has been to enact it into law. This has left two points, contained in the bill before you, which have not been granted by Presidential regulation, and concerning which differences of opinion have existed.

The first point has had to do with restoration of the payments received by the entire service-connected World War disabled group. This cost has been estimated at $31,308,000 by the Veterans' Administration, although the Legion has believed that the cost would be substantially less than this sum.

The second point concerns eligibility to service connection for World War disability, and affects some 29,000 so-called "presumptives." The first year's cost of this proposal has been estimated by the Veterans' Administration at $10,900,000.

I will now discuss briefly the first point, that affecting restoration of the rates of pay received by the World War disabled group, concerning whom everyone admits there is no doubt that World War service disabled them. The types of afflictions which have disabled this group can be roughly subdivided into four groups, which are, veterans suffering from tuberculosis, from neuropsychiatric disease, from general medical and surgical afflictions, and the amputation cases.

The monthly payments received by these groups under the World War Veterans' Act, as compared to the amounts they receive under the Economy Act, have been calculated by the Veterans' Administration for the Legion, and they are herewith submitted for your consideration. It must be kept in mind that all of these rates affect only direct service-connected war disabilities, and are given in averages for each group concerned.

Tuberculosis: The old rate was $59.91 a month. The new rate is $41.95 a month, or a monthly reduction under the Economy Act of $17.96.

Neuropsychiatric disease: The old rate was $56.28 a month. The new rate is $38.86 a month, or a reduction in the monthly pay of this group of $17.42.

General medical and surgical: The old rate was $34.31 a month, while the new rate is only $27.54 a month, a reduction of $6.77.

Amputations: The disabled composing this group are nearly all battle casualties. The average rate of pay last year was $68.24 a month. This has been reduced under the Economy Act to $58.62, a cut of $9.62.

The differences in the rates of pay have been slightly increased because of the hospitalization conditions in the two laws. Under the World War Veterans' Act a veteran who was only partially disabled received payments while in hospital for total disability, thus temporarily increasing his pay.

Under the Economy Act all service-connected veterans have their compensation substantially reduced while in hospital. This hospitalization factor has tended to increase the divergence between the rates of pay, especially affecting the two groups which have required the greatest proportionate hospitalization—the tuberculosis group and the neuropsychiatric group.

I think you gentlemen will recall that during the debate of the Economy Act a year ago, it was repeatedly stated in the Congress that nobody planned and nobody desired that the veterans who had been admittedly disabled by their World War service should have one cent taken away from their disability compensation. Yet we find now that, notwithstanding the increases which have been made by Presidential regulations, substantial amounts have been taken away from the war disabled which I have just set forth.

The Legion does not now believe, nor have we ever believed, that it was the desire of the American people or the American Congress to reduce so sharply the Government's payments to the admittedly World War disabled.

President Roosevelt, in addressing our national convention at Chicago last October, told the Legion the following in connection with this group:

"Furthermore, it is my hope that, insofar as justice concerns those whose disabilities are, as a matter of fact, of war-service origin, the Government will be able to extend even more generous care than is now provided under existing regulations. It is to these men that our obligation exists."

So much for the restoration of service-connected disability payments which the Legion has sought and provision for which is made in the independent offices bill now once more before you.

This bill, however, contains certain exceptions to a blanket restoration of payments, exceptions which the Legion itself has advocated. So, as a matter of fact, although the bill would in theory restore the old payments, it would not do so in all cases.

I now come to the second point at issue, which is the third point in the Legion's program—that of restoration of eligibility to service connection as it existed prior to the Economy Act.

This concerns the 29,000 so-called "presumptives", 90 percent of whom are World War veterans suffering from tuberculosis or neuropsychiatric disease, men whose disabilities had been connected with their service under laws in existence since 1921, subsequently twice amended insofar as the presumptive date was concerned.

These men constitute 58 percent of a group of presumptives who had their service connection broken under the Economy Act, but whose cases were subsequently reviewed by the Presidential veterans' review boards.

Everyone has recognized that unsatisfactory results have been obtained from these boards. Some of them restored as many as 75 percent of the presumptive cases reviewed. Others restored only 24 percent. It has been apparent to all that such a wide divergence in results could not provide even-handed justice for the disabled veterans involved.

These men, for the most part, have received Government protection for an average of 10 years. They have ordered their lives upon what they believed to be a governmental guarantee of their security. The Economy Act and the subsequent review-board actions have swept this away. Without Government assistance, the situation of thousands of these men will be pitiful indeed.

Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, who was in charge of the bill in the Senate, offered to restore these men to the service-connected rolls at 75 percent of their former payments. This offer was made presumably on behalf of the administration. It proposed a temporary restoration only, with payments to be made until review of the cases on appeal could be had by the newly created veterans' appeal boards.

The cost of this proposal was estimated at $10,900,000 a year, or the exact same yearly cost which would be incurred to restore this group to the rolls permanently. The point at issue between the administration's plan and the Legion's plan was this: Under the administration's plan the appeals board would pass upon the veterans' eligibility to service connection, under the very same rigid and restrictive rules and regulations of the Economy Act, through the operation of which they had their service connection broken a year ago.

Service connection is difficult to establish 10 or 12 years after a disability has developed. Thousands of these men are insane and are confined in the Government hospitals. Other thousands now lie upon their backs upon beds for the tubercular. There is small opportunity for either class to now prove their direct service connection. It was this very difficulty which the Congress had in mind when on its own initiative it enacted the presumptive legislation, for the Congress realized even then the difficulty of proving service connection in many thousands of cases.

The Legion has not believed that governmental justice could be obtained under the plan advocated by Senator BYRNES. We have therefore asked that the burden of proof be placed upon the Government and not upon the disabled men. We ask, in effect—and the bill before you provides this—that the Government restore this comparatively small group of disabled men to the service-connected rolls, where the Government cannot show that the veteran acquired his disability before his World War service or after his World War service. The Legion estimates that this would retain on the rolls about two thirds of this group of presumptives. The Legion does not ask restoration where the showing referred to can be made by the Government; but lacking such proof on the Government's part, the Legion has asked that these men be restored their service-connected eligibility.

These, then, are the two main points for which the Legion has been contending in the independent offices bill, and it is our hope that the Congress may secure a clear understanding of our contentions before voting upon the veto proposal.

Very respectfully yours,

E. A. HAYES,
National Commander.

HON. GORDON BROWNING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. IMHOFF].

Mr. IMHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in support of this bill and to touch upon the present situation of one of the largest industries in my district, that of the pottery industry, and the possible remedial effects of the passage of this bill upon said industry.

It is well known that we export only about 10 percent of our products, and the other 90 percent is consumed under ordinary conditions by our own people. However, during the last 3 or 4 years our export trade has fallen off, and at the same time the purchasing power of our people has been lowered to such an extent that the situation has been reached where one of two things must be done, either production must be greatly curtailed or there must be a development of foreign markets. In fact, it may be necessary to do both.

In my opinion, if these conditions can be remedied, it will entirely solve the biggest problem that has confronted the American people for the last 3 years, that of domestic unemployment, and which is the very essence of the economic emergency in which we have been floundering.

Many of our industries under these conditions, and in spite of the high tariff rates imposed by the Tariff Act of 1930, have been helpless and at a standstill. There are some instances where the tariff rates ought to be lowered, and there are other instances where they ought to be raised. To try to correct this situation by having Congress enact an entirely new tariff act, with its endless schedules, its delays, and its inability to cover individual and special cases by general provisions, would, in my opinion, fail to bring the relief that must be brought, and that quickly.

As an example of what would happen, should this Congress enter upon a general overhauling of the Tariff Act of 1930, you need only refer to the time consumed in the passage of former tariff bills. Another concrete reminder is the hapless path of the independent offices bill, that has been kicked from pillar to post for the last 3 months.

This bill proposes to vest in the President the power to regulate the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the interests of American industry and at the same time, through trade agreements, develop markets for the products of American industry. Under the provisions of the bill the President could negotiate trade agreements that would be beneficial to both countries concerned; in other instances, where he found existing duties acting as a restriction to foreign trade, he could decrease such duties to the extent of 50 percent, and it is my understanding that in any case where the duty was not sufficiently high to give the required protection to any American industry, he could increase the duty to a maximum of 50 percent.

It seems to me that the divers difficulties confronting our foreign trade are such that the method proposed in this bill is the most logical, the quickest, and the most effective way in which the task could be accomplished. The President needs no argument in behalf of his leadership. The accomplishments and achievements of the first year of his administration stand as a monument to his leadership, to which you or I could add nothing; and, as a result of that leadership, the American people have given him, regardless of party, their confidence as they have given no man in your time or mine.

I have no qualms about intrusting this great and important task to the President of the United States.

The moves to be made to rehabilitate American industry and to relieve unemployment must be made as soon as possible. This bill provides that way.

It has been said here that it is dangerous to place so much power in the hands of one man; that the provisions of this bill casts scientific procedure to the winds and throws the whole industry of the country open to the whims of one individual. It appears to me that much of the effect of such pronouncements is eaten up by the fact that the individual referred to is Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.] Then, again, I wish to remind you that since last June the President, under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, has had about the same power as is granted in this bill. Under section 3 (e) of the Recovery Act the President is given power to limit importations of foreign goods, and upon his own motion to issue an absolute embargo. During the last 9 months since the enactment of this law there is not a single instance where this power has been abused or used to the detriment of any industry.

I am interested in this bill because I feel that under its provisions one of the largest industries in my district, the pottery industry, would be rehabilitated, and the thousands of employees, who have been walking the streets for 3 years, would be placed to work and enabled to provide the necessities of life to their families.

The pottery industry, as compared with other industries, is a small industry, but it is one of the largest in my district, and of the utmost importance to the men who have invested millions of dollars in the business, and to the thousands of employees who have given the best years of their lives to perfecting themselves in this line of employment.

During the last 3 or 4 years on account of the depreciation of the Japanese yen, and the notoriously cheap labor in Japan, the Japanese have been able to dump Japanese chinaware by the millions of dozens into this country and sell it at a figure far below the cost of production in our own plants. Encouraged by a subsidy on the part of the Imperial Government the pottery interests of Japan have increased their imports the last few years until last June the importations reached the enormous figure of 705,716 dozens; in July, 704,162; in August, 711,152; in September, 749,489; and in October, 768,489 dozens.

In direct proportions to the increase in the Japanese importations the sales of the industry in this country have fallen off.

For example:

The sales for 1929 were $33,488,000.

The sales for 1930 were $27,572,000.

The sales for 1931 were $23,300,000.

The sales for 1932 were $16,385,000.

In other words, the sales for 1932 were 51 percent less than for 1929.

This situation is impossible and intolerable, and I would be traitorous to my constituency, and to the men who have given the best part of their lives to the development of this industry, if I should not exert every effort to secure legislation and Executive action that will bring relief.

I believe that the provisions of this bill will so fortify the powers given the President under the National Recovery Act that through one or the other the pottery industry and other industries that have been driven to the wall by the unfair and intolerable competition of Japanese importations will be enabled to at least compete in the open market, make a reasonable profit, and place the thousands of men back to work who have walked the streets for 3 years.

I do not care how this is accomplished, whether it is done by placing Japanese importations on a quota, placing a higher duty on such importations, or by declaring an absolute embargo. I am in favor of whichever will give the quickest and most effective results. If we are to place industries suffering from such competition on the high road to recovery, some such action must be taken. They have a right to expect it, and you and I have a right to demand it. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

On March 25, 1934:

H.R. 3554. An act for the relief of Pinkie Osborne.

On March 26, 1934:

H.R. 5228. An act to authorize the payment of hospital and other expenses arising from an injury to Florence Glass;

H.R. 6185. An act fixing the date for holding elections of a Delegate from Alaska to the House of Representatives and of members of the Legislature of Alaska; fixing the date on which the Legislature of Alaska shall hereafter meet; prescribing the personnel of the Territorial canvassing board, defining its duties, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 7808. An act to authorize annual appropriations to meet losses sustained by officers and employees of the United States in foreign countries due to appreciation of foreign currencies in their relation to the American dollar, and for other purposes.

On March 24, 1934:

H.R. 8573. An act to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands, to provide for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

On March 26, 1934:

H.J.Res. 207. Joint resolution requiring agricultural or other products to be shipped in vessels of the United States where the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any other instrumentality of the Government finances the exporting of such products; and

H.R. 8134. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

On March 27, 1934:

H.R. 257. An act to authorize full settlement for professional services rendered to an officer of the United States Army;

H.R. 5631. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to place with the Oklahoma Historical Society, at Oklahoma City, Okla., as custodian for the United States, certain records of the Five Civilized Tribes and of other Indian tribes in the State of Oklahoma, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him;

H.R. 5745. An act granting abandoned public buildings and grounds at Sitka, Alaska, to the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 6604. An act to establish the composition of the United States Navy with respect to the categories of vessels limited by the treaties signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, and at London, April 22, 1930, at the limits prescribed by those treaties, to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

VETO OF THE INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL (H.DOC. NO. 291)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval H.R. 6663, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes." I am impelled to do this on a number of grounds, any one of them sufficient to require disapproval of the bill.

In March 1933 the Congress passed, and I signed, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government." This law became one of the principal pillars of national recovery for the clear reason that for the first time in many years the recurring annual expenses for the maintenance of the Government were brought within the current revenues of the Government. It is true that very large but wholly distinct funds are being dispensed daily for emergency purposes, but these funds are going directly to the purpose of saving farms, saving homes, and giving relief and employment to millions of our fellow citizens. They are nonrecurring in nature, while the increases contemplated in this bill are continuous and permanent.

Furthermore, the Budget submitted by me to the Congress on January 4, 1934, laid down a definite program of expenditures and a definite estimate of receipts. Because of the emergency expenditures for relief and unemployment, the expected total deficits this year and in 1935 are necessarily large; but at the same time a program for a completely balanced Budget by June 30, 1936, was determined upon as a definite objective.

This bill exceeds the estimates submitted by me in the sum of $228,000,000. I am compelled to take note of the fact that in creating this excess the Congress has failed at the same time to provide a similar sum by additional taxation. Moreover, to the extent that the amount of money appropriated by the Congress is in excess of my Budget estimates, and in the absence of provision for additional revenues there must be a decrease in the funds available for essential relief work.

This bill increases the compensation for employees of the United States Government $125,000,000 over my Budget estimates for this purpose. I have great sympathy for the employees, but I cannot forget that millions of American citizens are today still without employment, and reduction in the compensation of Federal employees has been and still is on the average less than the reduction in compensation that has been patiently endured by those citizens not in the employ of the United States Government.

Let me be specific. This bill makes a portion of the restored compensation retroactive to February 1, 1934. I believe it unwise to establish this precedent, and I cannot overlook the serious administrative difficulties involved in paying back pay to individuals, many of whom are no longer in the employ of the Government.

The bill also contains several discriminatory provisions, such as paying employees in some departments of the Government 48 hours' pay for 40 hours' work.

In submitting the Budget estimates last December I recommended compensation restoration of 5 percent for the next fiscal year. The cost of living seems to be rising slowly. The present authority is not responsive enough to changing conditions. I, therefore, shall be glad to confer with the Congress on improving the methods of restoring Federal pay so that in actual practice the pay will keep ahead of the cost of living increase instead of lagging behind. Adjustments can well be made immediately on the passage of appropriate legislation followed by more frequent adjustments in the future.

I come now to the provisions in this act relating to World War veterans. First let me speak of principles. Last October I said this to the American Legion convention:

The first principle, following inevitably from the obligation of citizens to bear arms, is that the Government has a responsibility for and toward those who suffered injury or contracted disease while serving in its defense.

The second principle is that no person, because he wore a uniform, must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens. The fact of wearing a uniform does not mean that he can demand and receive from his Government a benefit which no other citizen receives. It does not mean that because a person served in the defense of his country, performed a basic obligation of citizenship, he should receive a pension from his Government because of a disability incurred after his service had terminated and not connected with that service.

It does mean, however, that those who were injured in or as a result of their service, are entitled to receive adequate and generous compensation for their disabilities. It does mean that generous care shall be extended to the dependents of those who died in or as a result of service to their country.

I am very confident that the American people, including the overwhelming majority of veterans themselves, approve these principles and in the last analysis will support them.

Applying them to the provisions of this bill, I cannot give it my approval.

Last year it was determined—and I had hoped permanently—that a service-connected disability is a question of fact rather than a question of law. In other words, each individual case should and must be considered on its merits, and there is no justification for legislative dicta which, contrary to fact, provide that thousands of individual cases of sickness which commenced 4, 5, or 6 years after the termination of the war are caused by war service. Therefore local boards were established—boards on which three out of the five members were in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and on which two thirds of those serving were ex-service men. These local boards approved disallowances in the case of 29,000 veterans and these decisions were unanimous in 94 percent of the cases. Not content with that, I created a board of appeals, the majority of which again are in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and a majority of which are ex-service men. This board is now engaged in hearing appeals of those cases disallowed by the local boards.

A few weeks ago I gave approval to an amendment, the purpose of which was, pending the determination of their appeals, to restore to the rolls at 75 percent of their compensation those veterans in whose cases the presumption of service connection was disallowed by the local boards. This, however, was rejected in the Congress. I intend now by regulation forthwith to direct an appeal by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in each and every one of these disallowed 29,000 cases with the further direction that in the final determination of these cases every reasonable doubt be resolved in favor of the veteran, and every assistance be rendered in the preparation and presentation of these cases. While these cases are pending the veterans will be paid 75 percent of the compensation they received prior to the time they were removed from the rolls. If the appeal is allowed, they will receive back compensation. Only in cases disallowed by the board of appeals will the veteran thereafter be permanently removed from the rolls. This regulation will be put into effect at once.

By reason of the fact that many totally and permanently disabled veterans have been the recipients of benefits from their Government for a long period of time, it is difficult in the event of a disallowance of service connection by the final board of appeals to remove them completely from the rolls. Existing regulations, therefore, provide that if their cases are disallowed, and if they are found to be totally and permanently disabled, they shall, notwithstanding fundamental principles enunciated, if in need, receive $30 a month and domiciliary care and hospitalization.

It is a simple and undeniable fact that the United States, in terms of compensation and in terms of hospitalization, has done and is doing infinitely more for our veterans and their dependents than any other government.

I come now to the provisions of the bill relating to Spanish-American War veterans. To this group of ex-service men I have devoted much thought. Because of their age, they command sympathy. Nevertheless, we must recognize also that many abuses have crept into the laws granting them benefits.

The Spanish-American War veterans' amendment to this act provides for service pensions. This violates the principles upon which benefits to veterans should be paid and the principles to which I have referred in this message. Moreover, if that principle should in the future be applied to the World War veterans at the same rate as contemplated for Spanish-American War veterans by this bill, the annual and continuing charge upon the people of this country by 1949 will amount to more than $830,000,000 for that item alone. This would be in addition to the large cost of all existing veterans' benefits and future hospitalization. This I cannot approve.

However, I am today directing the restoration to the rolls of those Spanish-American War veterans who in 1920 were receiving pensions as a result of having sustained an injury or incurred a disease arising out of their war service.

By regulation 12 a presumption of service origin was extended to Spanish-American War veterans on the rolls on March 19, 1933. In order to take the same action which I am taking in regard to World War veterans, I am directing the restoration to the rolls, as of this date, at 75 percent of the amount they were receiving on March 19, 1933, all Spanish-American War veterans pending a final determination of their cases before the Board of Appeals.

Without going further into all of the details relating to the treatment—past, present, and future—of Spanish-American War veterans, it seems sufficient to repeat that I am wholly and irrevocably opposed to the principle of the general service pension, but I do seek to provide with liberality for all those who suffered because of their service in that war. As in the case of World War veterans, I shall not hesitate to further alter or modify the regulations in order that substantial justice may be done in every individual case.

What you and I are seeking is justice and fairness in the individual case. I call your specific attention to the fact that since the original regulations were established a year ago actual experience has shown many cases where these regulations required modification. I have not hesitated to take the necessary action and have issued regulations which have made many changes. These changes, based on principles of justice to the individual veteran, involve additional expenditures of approximately $117,000,000. It goes without saying that I shall not hesitate to make further changes if the principles of justice demand them.

On the basis of the original regulations following the Economy Act, the annual cost to the United States of veterans' relief was $486,000,000. Since that time by Executive order the addition of $117,000,000 increases to $603,000,000 the total cost for veterans' relief for the fiscal year 1935.

My disapproval of this bill is not based solely on the consideration of dollars and cents. There is a deeper consideration. You and I are concerned with the principles herein enunciated. I trust that the Congress will continue to cooperate with me in our common effort to restore general prosperity and relieve distress.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread upon the Journal and printed as a public document. The question is, Will the House upon reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked the indulgence of the House for this simple reason. This morning a great many Members on this side of the Chamber came to me and said they hoped consideration of this veto message would go over until tomorrow, that they might have an opportunity to calmly read and digest the message of the President. They felt that it was only fair under the circumstances, in view of the importance of this matter. I told them I thought that was a fair proposition, and so far as I was concerned, I was willing and anxious to have it go over until tomorrow. In addition to that, there are several Members unavoidably absent who are on their way back here. I think the vote should go over until tomorrow, but I am not going to make a motion or ask for a postponement of the vote, in view of the fact that those in charge of the bill wish to take up the matter now. So far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing that that may be done. It is up to the House whether they will consider it now. I am ready to vote on the proposition.

Mr. WOODRUM rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How much time does the gentleman expect to take up in the discussion of this veto message?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is my purpose to make a very brief explanation of what I understand the veto message to contain, and to answer, if I can, any questions that Members may want to ask me in order that we may understand as clearly as possible what is involved in the message, and then to move the previous question.

Mr. SNELL. If there is going to be any general debate, several Members on this side would like to have time.

Mr. WOODRUM. There is not going to be any general debate.

Mr. SNELL. There is to be nothing except what the gentleman is going to state?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; but I shall be glad to answer any legitimate questions any Member on either side of the aisle desires to ask me.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of my colleagues that I may endeavor to discharge a duty that I have to perform on this occasion. My only purpose in being here is because, as the Member of the House in charge of the bill, it is my duty to be here. My only desire is to give to my colleagues such information as I may possess, and then it is the duty and the responsibility of every one of us, individually as well as collectively, to discharge our duty.

When Congress a year ago passed the bill commonly known as the "economy bill", we conferred upon the President of the United States in that instance, as well as we have in many other instances, very broad and sweeping powers to deal with veterans' benefits. I think it is agreed by all of us, as it has been understood by the Chief Executive, that the practical operations of the first regulations passed under the Economy Act were too drastic, that they made cuts where cuts had not been intended, that cuts were very much more drastic than had been intended, and that the practical operation of it was not satisfactory. I emphasize to my colleagues and recall to them the fact that since the first regulations under the Economy Act were made—and I cite this as an evidence of the desire and purpose of the President to try to mete out substantial justice to the veterans as he understands it—those first regulations have been changed in something between 40 and 50 particulars, reinstating and reallocating for veterans' benefits something more than $117,000,000, that was taken away by the Economy Act. Many of those changes and regulations were made as a result of the activities of the Members of Congress. There is no question about that, and there is no pride of opinion in the matter. When the matter was up last session, all of us remember, a committee of veterans of the House, embracing in its Membership both sides of the aisle, I think, working on this matter. They waited upon and conferred with the President, and the whole matter was gone over. The side of the veterans was presented to the Chief Executive, and, as a result of that, something like between forty and fifty million dollars additional concessions were made, principally as a result of the activities of the House; and so, some of the concessions today being made, regardless of what action shall presently be taken upon this bill, I think may reasonably be traced to the very aggressive interest shown by the Congress in the veterans.

No matter how you shall presently vote on this veto message today, an Executive order will be signed putting back on the rolls the 29,000 presumptive cases, putting them back, ordering a review in each case, under more sympathetic conditions, and paying, pending the appeals, 75 percent of the funds they were getting when they were cut from the rolls. That is substantially what the so-called "Byrnes veterans' amendment" in the Senate amounted to.

Mr. KVALE. They are placed back temporarily until they have an appeal?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Just let me further answer the question of the gentleman from Minnesota. It is a little more than that, because the President by his Executive order is directing an appeal in every one of those cases. It has developed that some of the veterans, possibly not aware of their right to take an appeal, who were stricken from the rolls in presumptive cases, have not yet taken an appeal in their cases, but the President has directed by Executive order, or is directing by Executive order, an appeal in each one of those cases, and that affirmative action be taken to take up the cases and secure all available evidence, and has further directed that every doubt shall be resolved in favor of the veteran.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The fact is that the bill now before us carries approximately $150,000,000 less than it did when it first came back from the Senate. We have forced it to be reduced about $150,000,000. Is not that the fact?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think so, approximately.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not further a fact that if this veto is sustained, unless there can be legislation brought in here and passed before July 1, all salaries of Government employees are automatically restored 100 percent on July 1, and by passing this bill over the President's veto we will prevent our own salaries from being fully restored on July 1? It would require legislation to prevent cuts from being fully restored.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, in order to prevent all salaries from being restored automatically on July 1, it is necessary to pass this bill now, is it not?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not agree with the gentleman; no.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. I believe all of us feel that the boards out in the regional offices were just as liberal as they could be under the regulations. When the appeal board here reviews those cases to determine whether they stay on or go off entirely, will they be subject to the same regulations as the boards were in the field, or will the regulations under which they consider it be liberalized, so that some more of the men may be granted service connection by the central board?

Mr. WOODRUM. As I understand, the President's Executive order is for the purpose of trying to bring about more uniformity among the decisions of the boards in the field. Those of us who have looked at the statistics have found great variation. Regional boards in one district would have a much higher percentage of allowance, and so forth.

The President, by Executive order, is bringing every case before his central board for rereview under his own scrutiny, and under more liberal provisions, and upon that, putting the presumptive cases back upon the record.

Mr. BROWNING. On what does the gentleman base his statement that there are more liberal provisions? I have never heard of one.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman knows that when a case goes to the central board of appeals from the regional board the first step in the procedure is that the case is reviewed to see whether or not there is any possibility of obtaining more evidence. That is done in the Bureau. That is actually being done. There is personnel in the Veterans' Bureau whose prime purpose it is to take that case and see whether or not there is evidence that has been mentioned, or that it is possible to obtain, that will help that veteran's case, or can be put into his folder. The evidence is built up and the evidence secured and put into his folder before the case is brought up for appeal. The veteran may appear personally or by counsel, or both, if he desires. So it seems to me he has more opportunity to perfect his case. The President has said to his central board of appeals, "Bring the case up and open it up again, and if there is any evidence or any facts or any circumstances that will throw light on the matter and assist us in arriving at the truth, it must be brought in." And upon all of that consideration every doubt must be resolved in favor of the veteran.

Mr. BROWNING. Of course, every doubt being resolved in favor of the man was written into the law by Congress; but when it is brought here and the proof is made up, it is considered under the same rigid regulations that it was considered under in the field. I do not believe the gentleman can cite us one liberalization of a single regulation under which they are considered by the central board.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. The gentleman has stated that in theory the veteran is supposed to get the benefit of every document in his file that would lead to the establishment of his case. I am informed on reliable sources from veterans and other organizations that that is not done; that the Veterans' Bureau leans backward and does not help the veteran, but they conceal from him all the information that would lead to the establishment of his claim. As far as I am concerned, I do not have confidence in the reviewing boards.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman ought to get the facts in that case and take them to the President. That is what he should do. If they are treating him like that, he should take it to headquarters.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. With all of this complexity of the veterans' problem, does not the gentleman think it would be better for the American people, better and fairer for the veteran, if their standing should be a matter of law and not a matter of regulation? [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. It is a matter of law. We specifically provide in the law that when the President issues regulations they are edicts of law. It is a matter of law. There is no question about that.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is it not true that the difference between the regulations which the President has told us he was promulgating and the bill which we passed, is that the burden of proof is placed on the soldiers by the regulation which has been put into effect, while the burden of proof is put on the Government to throw them off, by our bill? Is not that the difference on the presumptives?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I do not think that is a fair statement of the difference in the regulation.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman know of any instance of liberalization of regulations by the President where that action has not been brought about by pressure upon the President, either by Congress or by the people?

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, yes; I think there have been many liberalizations in the regulations.

Mr. MOTT. Where he has done it voluntarily?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of his own motion; yes. The President is just as much interested as the Members of Congress are interested in it.

Mr. MOTT. I know of no such instance where he has made such liberalization.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman has not kept himself informed.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman know that France has not cut benefits to her veterans during these years of depression?

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I have been so busy trying to keep up with what is being done for our veterans in America that I have not had a chance to get over to France to find out what is being done there.

Mr. KENNEY. The gentleman will agree with me, I believe, that America is a richer country by far than France, and has twice the population?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think it is the best country on the face of the earth. We can agree on that.

Mr. KENNEY. Does not the gentleman think we ought to consider the same means by which France has been enabled to continue benefits to her veterans?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think we have considered that and that the Congress of the United States has been generous with the veterans of this country.

Mr. KENNEY. Now, does the gentleman know any reason, or does he know any Member of this House who has any reason, why we should not consider, and consider at once, the question of putting through this Congress a bill for a national lottery that would quickly raise the funds necessary to restore to veterans and their dependents the full benefits they were receiving before the passage of the Economy Act? [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I should like to say to my friend from Virginia that it seems to me one point has not been brought out in all this discussion, and that is the fact that there are thousands of presumptive cases in the country today who were far better soldiers in the line of battle than the directly service-connected cases, because these presumptives would not go to the hospitals even after being disabled, while the service-connected veterans did go and thereby had hospital records to prove connection with service, and today under any regulation these presumptives cannot prove service connection, although they were better soldiers than some of those who are service connected and now on the rolls. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia with respect to the Spanish-American War veterans—

Mr. WOODRUM. I am coming right to that subject and will explain it, I hope, to the gentleman's satisfaction.

Just one other word about the presumptive cases. I should like to say to my good friends on the Republican side that of course I expected them to be very impatient to get to this vote; but I am just a little bit concerned about the gentlemen over here on this side at the present moment. [Laughter.] I am not looking to you gentlemen, I will say, in all good nature and good spirit, for very much help. [Laughter.] But I do want just a few words with my brethren over here. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, about the presumptive cases. This Executive order puts them back on the rolls pending these reviews. There is going to be another Congress; we will be here again. [Laughter and applause.] At least, I hope we will all be here again.

The gentleman from New York asked me about the Spanish War veterans. The President's Executive order with reference to Spanish War veterans puts them all back on the roll as of today at 75 percent of what they were receiving on March 19, 1933, pending a review of their cases. He directs reviews in all these cases the same as in the presumptive World War cases.

With respect to the pay cut, the message, as I understood it, read from the Clerk's desk, takes the position that the Budget message recommended a 5-percent restoration as of July 1. The President, however, is asking for a more flexible and a more responsive method of determining rising costs of living. I want to direct this last word that I have to say to these gentlemen: God knows I do not have a personal interest in the world in this matter. I have tried to discharge the duty resting upon me as best I could; but I want to say to you, my Democratic brethren, right here on this side of the aisle, that it is a serious proposition we are called upon to pass on. I shall not undertake to tell you what to do or what not to do; but I want to say this to you: I do not think any of us can minimize or should minimize the effect on this Nation if the time has come—and God grant that it has not—when we cannot out of 300 Democrats find 150 that will vote with the President on a matter of such vital importance to his program.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, he has not yet answered my question about the Spanish War veterans.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman state his question?

Mr. SISSON. Am I right in my understanding that for the Spanish-American War veterans to be restored to the rolls they must have service-connected disability in effect prior to 1920?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman means for them to be permanently restored to the rolls?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. A vote of "yea" is to pass the bill over the President's veto and a vote of "nay" is to sustain the President's veto?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 310, nays 72, not voting 50, as follows:

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against these announcements.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House convenes tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal, I may be permitted to address the House on the subject of a lottery for the benefit of veterans and their dependents, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PROPERTY DAMAGED BY EARTHQUAKE

Mr. MCCORMACK submitted the following conference report on the bill (H.R. 7599), to provide emergency aid for the repair or reconstruction of homes and other property damaged by earthquake, tidal wave, flood, tornado, or cyclone in 1933 and 1934:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7599) to provide emergency aid for the repair or reconstruction of homes and other property damaged by earthquake, tidal wave, flood, tornado, or cyclone in 1933 and 1934, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the text of the bill and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert:

"That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered, through such existing agency or agencies as it may designate, to make loans to nonprofit corporations, with or without capital stock, organized for the purpose of financing the acquisition of home or building sites in replacement of sites formerly occupied by buildings where such sites are declared by public authority to be unsafe by reason of flood, danger of flood, or earthquake, and for the purpose of financing the repair or construction of buildings or structures, or water, irrigation, gas, electric, sewer, drainage, flood-control, communication or transportation systems, damaged or destroyed by earthquake, conflagration, tornado, cyclone, or flood in the year 1933, and in the months of January and February 1934, and deemed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be economically useful or necessary.

"Obligations accepted hereunder shall be collateralized—

"(a) In case of loans for the acquisition, repair, or reconstruction of private property, by the obligations of the owner of such property, secured by a paramount lien except as to taxes and special assessments on the property to be acquired, repaired, or reconstructed, or on other property of the borrowers;

"(b) In case of loans for the repair or reconstruction of privately owned water, gas, electric, communication, or transportation systems, by the obligations of the owners of such water, gas, electric, communication or transportation systems, secured by a lien thereon; and

"(c) In case of loans for the repair or reconstruction of property of municipalities or political subdivisions of States or of their public agencies, including public-school boards and public-school districts, and water, irrigation, sewer, drainage, and flood-control districts, by an obligation of such municipality, political subdivision, public agency, board, or district, payable from any source, including taxation or tax-anticipation warrants.

"In any case in which any such loan is made, in whole or in part, for the acquisition of land in replacement of land privately owned and declared by public authority to be unsafe by reason of flood, danger of flood, or earthquake, such unsafe property shall be conveyed by the owner thereof, without cost, to the county, municipality, or district in which such property is situated.

"The Corporation shall not deny otherwise acceptable applications for loans for repair or reconstruction of buildings or structures, or water, irrigation, gas, electric, sewer, drainage, flood control, communication or transportation systems of municipalities, political subdivisions, public agencies, boards, or districts because of constitutional or other legal inhibitions affecting the collateral. The collateral obligations shall have maturities not exceeding 10 years in case of loans made under paragraph (a) of this act and not exceeding 20 years in case of loans under paragraphs (b) and (c) of this act.

"The Corporation shall prescribe such regulations as will most effectively expedite the repair and construction provided for by this act and effectively carry out the emergency relief purposes of this act.

"The aggregate of loans made under this act shall not exceed $5,000,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H.R. 7599) to provide emergency aid for the repair or reconstruction of homes and other property damaged by earthquake, tidal wave, flood, tornado, or cyclone in 1933 and 1934, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House bill amended section 203 of the National Industrial Recovery Act to authorize loans by the President through the Administrator of Public Works to nonprofit corporations to finance projects for the repair or reconstruction of buildings, private homes, structures, lands, and public-service systems damaged or destroyed by earthquake, tidal wave, flood, tornado, or cyclone in the years 1933 and 1934 and deemed by the Administrator to be economically useful.

The Senate amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute for the House bill, makes provision for similar loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and, in addition, authorizes loans to finance the acquisition of home or building sites in replacement of sites formerly occupied by buildings where such sites are declared by public authority to be unsafe by reason of flood, danger of flood, or earthquake. The application of the provisions of the Senate amendment is limited, however, to cases of damages occurring in 1933 and during the months of January and February 1934, and the aggregate of loans made for the purposes of the act by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are not to exceed $3,000,000.

The conference agreement retains the provisions of the Senate amendment with respect to the making of loans but increases the aggregate loan limit to $5,000,000. Provisions are also included to the effect that the corporation may designate an existing agency or agencies for making the loans and authorizing the corporation to prescribe regulations to effectively expedite and carry out the purposes of the bill.

The Senate amendment amends the title of the bill to correspond to the changes made to the text of the bill, and the House recedes.

JOHN W. McCORMACK,
CHARLES WEST,
W. E. EVANS,

Managers on the part of the House.

THE LATE HENRY A. BARNHART

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes to announce the death of a former Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, it has become the sad duty of my colleague [Mr. DUGAN] and myself to inform the House of the death last night of Hon. Henry A. Barnhart at his residence in Rochester, Ind., aged 75 years. This intelligence will cause sorrow to all who knew this lovable, loyal man.

Mr. Barnhart represented the old Thirteenth Indiana District, now represented by my colleague [Mr. DUGAN] and myself, for a period of 11 years. He was first elected to the Sixtieth Congress to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Abraham L. Brick, and was reelected to the Sixty-first and four succeeding Congresses. His period of service was from November 3, 1908, to March 3, 1919.

This is not the time to appraise adequately the record of this distinguished public servant, who gave his industry, his intelligence, and his patriotism without stint to the service of the Nation during the years preceding and continuing during the World War. It is enough to say, and it is the most that can be said at the end of life, that "he deserved well of the Republic." Peace to his ashes!

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—JOANNA A. SHEEHAN (H.DOC. NO. 292)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H.R. 3908, entitled "An act for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan."

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem, in favor of Joanna A. Sheehan, of Haverhill, Mass., upon filing of the usual bond of indemnity, United States Liberty Loan permanent coupon bond no. 321498, in the denomination of $1,000, of the third 4¼'s, issued May 9, 1918, matured September 15, 1928, with interest from the date of issue to the date of maturity, at the rate of 4¼ percent per annum, without presentation of said bond, the said bond, together with coupons due September 15, 1922, to September 15, 1928, inclusive, attached, alleged to have been lost, stolen, or destroyed.

This bill is objectionable since it provides for the payment of interest on the bond. Paid interest coupons are not now assorted and recorded by serial numbers, and obviously the coupons which were attached when the bond was lost may have been paid, or may be paid in the future, and the Treasury Department would not be in a position to know of such payment, so that a bond of indemnity would afford no protection to the United States so far as these coupons are concerned.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be entered on the Journal, and the bill and message will be printed as a public document.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in view of the action we have just taken, as a consolation to my Democratic colleagues here, may I read a statement that the great William Jennings Bryan made in this Hall on a similar occasion in 1893?—

The President of the United States, in the discharge of his duty as he sees it, has sent to Congress a message calling attention to the present financial situation, and recommending the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law as the only means of securing immediate relief. Some outside of the Hall have insisted that the President's recommendation imposes upon Democratic Members an obligation, as it were, to carry out his wishes, and overzealous friends have even suggested that opposition to his views might subject the hardy dissenter to administrative displeasure. They do the President great injustice who presume that he would forget for a moment the independence of the two branches of Congress. He would not be worthy of our admiration or even respect if he demanded a homage which would violate the primary principles of free representative government.

(Mr. MOTT asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.)

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, until a short time ago I had no intention of speaking on the bill which we are now considering, but just prior to the reading of the President's veto message my friend and colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. IMHOFF] addressed the House in favor of the passage of this bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. IMHOFF] represents one of the greatest pottery districts in the United States. I also have the honor of representing, in part, a pottery district, and I do not believe there is any industry in the country today that has suffered more from foreign competition than the pottery industry of the United States; and with all due respect to my good friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. IMHOFF], I seriously doubt he was speaking for the pottery industries and the workers in those factories when he said he was in favor of the passage of this bill. One of the reasons he gave for advocating the passage of the bill was that it gave the President the power to increase tariff duties 50 percent.

Mr. John E. Dowsing, representing the United States Potters Association, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and opposed this bill.

I now desire to quote from the committee hearings part of Mr. Dowsing's statement:

The President now possesses the power, under the flexible provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930, to raise or lower existing tariff rates up to 50 percent. He has the power under section 3 of the National Recovery Act to increase rates, as provided in H.R. 8430, to assist in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency by simply having section 3 put into effect, limiting the ruinous importations of competitive goods. He has further power, under section 333, where foreign countries have raised their tariffs or done some other overt act against this country. If that is all that is wanted, the law is on the books now and should be invoked and not remain a dead letter as it has been for some 9 months since the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. Did not the gentleman whom my friend is quoting represent the Potters Association and the employees thereof?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes; I so stated at the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. TREADWAY. And did he not say there were 18,000 members of this association of which he was the representative?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Therefore, was not the gentleman from Ohio, who preceded the gentleman, quite far from the facts when he said he represented the pottery industry?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not know that the gentleman said he represented the potters.

Mr. TREADWAY. But he stated he spoke for his constituents.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes; but I do not believe he spoke with any authority for the potters and their employees.

Mr. Dowsing further said:

We believe international bargaining with the tariff will mean the undermining of the protective policy and the undermining of our industries.

This is the representative of the National Potters Association speaking before the Ways and Means Committee.

This bill removes the tariff problem from the people, as represented by Congress, and automatically places the industries of this country in the hands of those who may or may not act wisely.

I wanted to make this statement, Mr. Chairman, because, like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. IMHOFF] I, in part, represent a pottery district. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to discuss the genesis and the evolution of the doctrine of reciprocity.

Before doing so I pause to say that while the American people were developing our almost limitless natural resources and our rapidly expanding foreign and domestic commerce, although the productive capacity of our industrial plants had been artificially stimulated and enlarged by high-tariff laws, we were able, for the time being, to consume the major products of our farms, mills, and factories. But in our industrial and agricultural life we have now brought our production to the point where, even under normal and prosperous conditions, we are producing more farm and factory commodities than can be consumed in the United States or for which we can hope to find a market abroad unless we adopt the policy embodied in the pending measure.

We have reached the saturation point and will be forced by the logic of events to curtail radically the production of agricultural and industrial commodities unless we can find a market abroad for our rapidly increasing surpluses.

May I say that in all the tide of time no nation has ever attained a position of preeminence and become rich and powerful that did not have a large foreign commerce. By its foreign trade, a nation may reach out to the remote regions of the world and secure a part of the wealth of far-away lands. Much of the wealth of Europe was acquired by commerce with foreign nations.

The American people cannot be prosperous if we live only for ourselves, trade only among ourselves, and refrain from international commerce. If we are to find a market for the surplus products of our mills, mines, farms, and factories, we must seek that market abroad.

Our industrial activities have been artificially stimulated to such an abnormal extent that we can dismantle one third of our factories and operate the other two thirds 9 months a year, and in that time produce more factory products than can be sold in our domestic markets, or for which we can find a sale in foreign markets. It would be an act of supreme folly for us to abandon our fight for our part of the world trade. Why should we supinely surrender our foreign commerce that has always been one of the important sources of our national wealth?

At this stage of the debate now in progress, it is well to pause and inquire, Where are we, in what direction are we traveling, what do we seek to accomplish, and are the proposed methods sound and workable, and not subversive of our scheme of constitutional Government?

When Grant at Appomattox refused the proffered sword of Lee, the war for the independence of the Southern States was at an end. The Republican Party, the party which had given Lincoln to the ages, deprived of his leadership and living upon his reputation, was then compelled to find some justification for its continued existence as a political organization, some reason why it should further enjoy the loaves and fishes of governmental patronage.

The Democratic Party, then as ever, stood as the champion of the historic Jeffersonian doctrine: "Equal and exact justice to all men, special privileges to none", and the supremacy of human rights over property rights.

Consequently it became necessary for the Republican Party to get on the other side of the fence. Thereupon it adopted the idea of protection as a party slogan and undertook to sell to the American people, a superstitious belief in high tariffs, and much as the doctor who cured all his patients by first throwing them into fits and then curing the fits, our friend, the enemy, in days of storm or sunshine, prescribed an increased duty on imports as the solution of every problem.

In the carrying out of this sales campaign, we heard much of "infant industries", "high wages", "American standards", "the foreigner pays the tax", "pauper labor of Europe", "American markets for American producers", and "America first", and a proclaiming to the world, the message:

The race is to the swift and the battle is to the strong. Let them keep who have, let them take who can, and let the devil take the hindmost.

The time allotted for the discussion of the bill pending before the House does not permit any enumeration of the woes unnumbered that have flowed from the enactment of unreasonably high tariff schedules during the years of Republican ascendancy in our national politics preceding the advent of Grover Cleveland as President on March 4, 1885.

Under the operation of that doctrine a favored class was created in America and the masses of the people were compelled to be satisfied with the drippings and the leavings that occasionally fell from the tables of those who feasted on governmental favoritism.

The belief that everyone was entitled to some kind of a privilege at the hands of Government naturally caused large numbers of people to say, "Let us get our share while the getting is good."

The Halls of Congress were converted into a market place. So many votes for a tariff on this product were exchanged for so many votes for a tariff on another product. Men of both parties failed in their allegiance to their party principles, seeking some special advantage for the people of their districts. The whole subject of legislation on the subject of import duties assumed a cynical aspect and became one of trade and barter, instead of being dependent upon some rule of action, some political theory on which the existence of the two parties depended.

Mr. Cleveland challenged the theory of the protective tariff. He assaulted the citadels of the plutocracy of America and called upon Congress to revise or amend the vicious, inequitable, and unjust tariffs then prevailing as a result of the years of Republican misrule and legislative favoritism.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, we may admit once for all that the doctrine of reciprocity belongs neither to the Republican Party nor to the Democratic Party. Like the cattle on the range that have never been marked with the brand of an owner, reciprocity is after all a political maverick, a "suffer-this-to-be-so-now", an expedient which both parties have at one time or another adopted as the nearest right, and the best step to take as the way out of a situation.

Reciprocity, the theory that one nation can make a trade with another nation, whereby, for example, France would agree to buy wheat and pork from America if America would buy silks and wines from France, does not accord with the Republican doctrines of protection, the theory of maintaining American markets exclusively for American producers, of putting up a tariff wall so high that nothing can get over it, and of refusing to buy the products of other countries.

Reciprocity, as manifested in the McKinley tariff bill, began by putting three products of America—sugar, molasses, and hides—on the free list; to that extent depriving them of the supposed benefits of the protective tariff. Then, by way of consolation, the American producers of these three products were told that if other products, which they did not export, were not fairly treated in the markets of the world, then a duty would be placed on the importation of sugar, molasses, and hides. Accurately analyzed, any program called "reciprocity" does not bring with it the benefit of protection.

On the other hand, the established Democratic doctrine of equal and exact justice to all men and special privileges to none, was not promoted by the reciprocity written in the McKinley tariff bill. When the President imposed a duty on sugar, molasses, hides, tea, and coffee because other products were not being fairly treated in foreign markets, equal and exact justice was not being done to all men, but special privileges were accorded to the American producers of the five articles named, as well as the producers of the articles which had been discriminated against in foreign countries.

In the days of the McKinley tariff bill, the Republican Party adopted what they called reciprocity as an anchor to windward, like the sailor who lands in any port in a storm or the captain of a ship who throws overboard a part of his cargo in order to avoid a wreck. The Republican Party came out of its belief in the virtues of the protective tariff to a limited extent and adopted the idea of reciprocity as outlined in the McKinley tariff bill in order that through giving up a part of the protective tariff, they might save the rest. Moreover, the acceptance of the doctrine of reciprocity was a confession by the Republican Party that the policy of ultra high tariff laws had failed to bring industrial peace and promote the welfare and prosperity of the masses.

In the present situation of world affairs the Democratic Party is confronted with a condition and not a theory. We are like the man who is driving an automobile and finds that the road over which he would like to go is temporarily in very bad order, and as he cannot afford to wait until the road's repairs are completed, for waiting would entail financial loss, he is compelled to make a detour. Some day the fundamental truth announced in the statement of Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Democratic Party, equal and exact justice to all men and special privileges to none, will be recognized throughout the world. When that day comes reciprocity will be thrown into the wastebasket and discarded, because it is avowedly a temporary measure invoked to meet a grave emergency which threatens the world's economic well being. When conditions become normal and the nations emerge from the economic chaos and pit of disaster into which ultranationalism has plunged them, the right to international trade will no longer be a matter of barter, no longer "cabin'd", "crib'd", "confin'd", but rather as broad and general as the casing air.

Until that day comes we must be content to take down our tariff walls one stone at a time, to make haste slowly, to learn to walk before we run, remembering that economic ills cannot be cured overnight, or through an ipse dixit, but only through the healing influence of time.

So there is no occasion at this time for either Democrats or Republicans to bring forth the issue of party consistency. Emerson has told us that consistency is the virtue of men who are not deemed wise. The man who drives ahead without looking for bumps in the road sometimes has a wreck. So we must be willing to take things as they are and do that which seems most expedient.

A poet of Kansas, known as "Iron Quill" (Mr. Eugene F. Ware), likened life unto a game of cards. He said that he did not like the cards that were dealt him—

But through the long, long night
And until the breaking of the day,
I play the hand I have
And do the best I may.

President Roosevelt, finding our foreign trade destroyed after 12 years of Republican rule, has found it not only expedient but necessary to employ emergency methods to quicken the revival and free flow of commerce.

As to the politics of reciprocity, Grover Cleveland did not believe in it. Upon one occasion he said:

If hypocrisy be the tribute which vice pays to virtue, reciprocity is the tribute which protection pays to genuine tariff reform.

One of his first official acts in his first term was to withdraw from the Senate certain reciprocal treaties negotiated by President Arthur, his Republican predecessor.

Fifty years later, in a Republican campaign speech, Calvin Coolidge approvingly cited the action of Grover Cleveland, a Democratic President, in differing with a Republican.

So we have Cleveland (a Democrat) and Coolidge (a Republican) entertaining the same views on a question thought to be political.

The first term of Mr. Cleveland ended without any tangible progress being made in the effort on his part to revise or amend the protective tariff laws.

When Benjamin Harrison became the Republican successor to Grover Cleveland, he selected that astute politician, that feeler of the public pulse, that high priest of Republicanism, James G. Blaine, as his Secretary of State.

Following the Republican policy of taking a dose of more tariff every few years, the Republican Party caused to be introduced in the House of Representatives, what is known in history as the "McKinley bill." It was so named because it was largely framed by William McKinley, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. This bill, as introduced, knew not reciprocity. They were as yet strangers to each other, and like ships that pass in the night, they spoke only at a distance.

A trade conference had been held in Washington under the tutelage of Mr. Blaine, as Secretary of State, to increase the trade of the United States with South America. Though ripe in experience and wise in statecraft, Mr. Blaine had not been advised that foreign markets did not exist. In that respect he lacked the vision displayed in the Republican minority report on the pending bill, and had not learned the new-fangled economic philosophy announced by Chairman SNELL and Chairman DICKINSON in their keynote speeches at the late, lamented Republican National Convention in Chicago last June, both of whom argued that the American people did not need any foreign trade and should not worry over its loss.

Mr. Blaine believed reciprocity would serve to lighten the load of the protective tariff and save the good ship from the storm of attack which Mr. Cleveland had set in motion. The McKinley bill passed a Republican House and reached a Republican Senate. Mr. Blaine said of it, that it did not open a single foreign market to an American producer. As Secretary of State, on June 4, 1890, James G. Blaine wrote a lengthy letter to President Harrison submitting a report upon a custom's union adopted by the International American Conference (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 6257-6259), recommending reciprocal trade relations with South America. President Harrison did not enthuse on the subject. (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 6256, 6257.)

The McKinley tariff bill was then pending before the Senate. Senator HALE, of Maine, submitted a reciprocity amendment to that bill, evidently Mr. Blaine's proposition, for Blaine, too, came from Maine.

The offering of Mr. Blaine's prescription of reciprocity as an amendment to the McKinley tariff bill, caused a wave of discussion to sweep through the Senate. As a class, Republicans were for it and Democrats opposed it. Such legal giants as Senators Hale, of Maine, Edmunds, of Vermont, and Hoar, of Massachusetts, made speeches in favor of the bill, while Senator Gray, of Delaware, characterized it an abandonment in part of the protective tariff.

Senator Vance—Democrat, North Carolina—quoted from a speech by Mr. Blaine:

* * * The United States has reached the point where one of its highest duties is to enlarge its foreign trade (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9155).

Senator HALE, Republican, said of reciprocity:

It is a departure from our previous policy. It broadens and widens that policy. It is a great step in the direction of opening to the production of our labor the markets of Central and South America and the islands of the great sea which lie between the continents. It commits to the President, whom we know by his communications to the Senate is in favor of this movement, powers which I am entirely willing should be placed in his hands. That he will exercise them wisely and in the true interest of American labor no man who knows his present attitude and his past history can doubt. (Quoted, 51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9587.)

Senator Pierce (Republican, North Dakota) claimed that prior to 1890 (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 9606) the Republican Party for 20 years had endeavored to obtain reciprocity. He said of the Hale amendment:

The latitude given the President is wide, his discretion ample, the power sufficient without being dangerous (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 9612).

Senator Spooner (Republican of Wisconsin) made a speech in favor of the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley bill. He said he was in favor—of some provision for reciprocal commercial arrangements with other countries (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 9878), and made a strong argument in favor of the constitutionality of the provision finally adopted.

Senator Aldrich, in the course of the debate, referred to a meat-inspection Act, reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which gave the President, in certain circumstances, the power to—direct that such products of such foreign State so discriminating against any product of the United States as he may deem proper shall be excluded from importation to the United States (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 9880).

Senator Evarts, Republican, New York, opposed delegating the power proposed in the McKinley bill to the President (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9882). His amendment to the reciprocity provision requiring the President to "communicate to Congress the facts which he shall have ascertained", so that Congress might act thereon was defeated, 30 to 34. Only two Republicans, Dolph and Evarts, voted for it. Such Republican wheel horses, the very flower of the party, as, for instance, Aldrich, Allison, Cushman K. Davis, Cullom, Dawes, of Massachusetts, Edmunds, Frye, Hawley, Hoar, of Massachusetts, Ingalls, Platt, Plumb, and Spooner (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9906) voted against the amendment.

The bill was passed by a party vote, 40 to 29 (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9943).

In Fifty-first CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 10655, Senator Morgan, Democrat, Alabama, in discussing the conference report, attacked the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley bill as deceptive. He quoted a letter from Mr. Blaine of date September 15, 1890, rejoicing in the passage of the bill, as a blow to free trade (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10657).

John Sherman stated—

Congress has the absolute right not only to impose duties but to leave to the President or any other authority the determination of some fact upon the happening of which a duty may be either removed or levied (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10658).

Senator Carlisle said of the McKinley bill, in opposing the bill:

All that Congress does in the matter is to prescribe the rate of duty, leaving all the circumstances, the entire question whether it ought or ought not to be imposed, to the judgment and discretion of the President himself.

Mr. Morgan, of Alabama, took the same position (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 10659).

The House concurred in the Senate amendment as to reciprocity, and so the bill was passed.

President Harrison issued many proclamations under the McKinley tariff bill.

The expected happened. Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, as importers of merchandise, brought a suit claiming the whole McKinley tariff bill was void. One of the provisions in the bill attacked in the courts in the suit so instituted, known as "Field against Clark", was section 3, known as the "reciprocity section."

The people of this country are entitled to understand, as near as may be, in plain English just how the attack was made in Field against Clark, and how it is made in the case of the pending bill, upon a provision in each bill, giving the President the right to do certain things with respect to the tariff.

All of us understand, of course, that our Constitution after all is like the book of rules that are used in a game or business or the laws of a church. To understand the Constitution, we must study the history of the times in which it was written, so we may understand the evil it was intended to avoid, and then we must apply the Constitution according to its spirit, with a view of accomplishing its intended purpose; that is, remedying the evil.

The United States of America achieved its independence after having been a part of England for more than a century. Our Declaration of Independence is filled with statements of the wrongs that the colonists, as the Americans were known prior to the Revolution, had suffered at the hands of the King of England, one of which is thus recorded: "Cutting off our trade with all parts of the world." This indictment convincingly demonstrates that our founders appreciated the value and importance of our foreign markets.

The people of this country in adopting the Constitution did not wish the President to have the powers of an absolute monarch, nor did they make of him a mere puppet without important prerogatives.

The writers of the Constitution turned to France for inspiration, and they followed the teachings of Montesquieu to the effect that where the power to enact the law, the power to interpret the law, and the power to enforce the law were all vested in the same person, tyranny and despotism might result.

The reason for this statement is plain. A person who is called upon to obey a law is entitled to know by reading the law just what are his rights and duties. He has a right to have a disinterested person take the law as written and tell him what it means. He is entitled to have a third person, who did not write the law and who did not interpret the law, carry into execution the judgment of the court under the law.

All this, as I understand it, is what the law means by the separation of the powers of government.

So our Constitution undertook to divide our Government into three different departments: The President, or the Executive to enforce the law; the courts, as the judiciary to interpret the law; and Congress, as the legislative body to enact the law.

In theory, these compartments are supposed to be watertight, and each of the three departments is expected like the shoemaker of old "to stick to its last and attend to its own business", leaving the other departments free of interference.

Some of our greatest thinkers, however, have pointed out that in practice such a divided authority is unworkable, and that just as a business must have a responsible directing hand, who keeps the machinery of the establishment going, our President must not only have the power to recommend but the power of direction and to some extent of control.

In view of the prevailing criticism of the President, of the frequent statements made that he is trying to be a dictator or a despot, we must console ourselves with the recollection that such attacks are not new in the history of our country. Like the tree in the orchard that has the best apples and consequently has the most stones thrown at its fruit, the greater the President the more likely he is to be attacked.

Washington and Jefferson are outstanding examples of Presidents who survived all that was said of them.

The Senate censured Jackson and later expunged the resolution. In August 1864 Abraham Lincoln believed that he was not going to be reelected. The storm of criticism visited upon the head of Lincoln, largely by his own party, during the days of Civil War is almost unbelievable.

Men like Theodore Roosevelt have been the storm centers of those who differed with their respective policies.

So that Franklin D. Roosevelt is not the first President to be reviled and misconstrued. Indeed the Republican national platform in 1920 contained a plank pledging the party—

To end Executive autocracy and to restore to the people their constitutional government.

Charging President Wilson with tenaciously clinging to his autocratic war powers, the platform stated that—

This usurpation is intolerable and deserves the severest condemnation.

The Wilson administration was charged with using legislation passed to meet the emergency of war in order to continue—

Its arbitrary and inquisitorial control over the life of the people in time of peace and carry confusion into industrial life. Under despot's plea of necessity our superior wisdom, Executive usurpation of legislative and judicial functions still undermine our institutions.

We may admit that the powers of the President are great, but this greatness in office is not due to any one President, but is the result of the logic of events in every line of business. Power after all is becoming more and more centralized in individual authority. The people look to responsible individuals in the conduct of nearly every business with which they have anything to do. The Presidency is no exception to this rule. However fervently a President may pray "let this cup pass from me", there are ways he must tread and to a great extent tread alone.

Theoretically, under the Constitution, a President is expected to recommend the legislation to be considered by Congress and then keep his hands off. The people of America expect more of their President. They elected Franklin D. Roosevelt not as a candidate, not as a party, but as an individual in whom they have confidence. A nation that will spend a million dollars in 1 night in dancing on the birthday of their President, or in which a section foreman in Missouri, a farmer in Kansas, or a Negro in Mississippi feels free to tell the President about a mortgage on his home, does not fear their President may become a tyrant or a despot.

But assuming that what is called the legislative power is placed in the hands of Congress, assuming that the people had a right to say to a Congressman, as they do to any other servant, "I expected you as my Congressman to look after this", I did not expect you to say, "Let George do it", and did not expect you to turn over or delegate your work to someone else, we approach that principle of law which the legal authors call the delegation of powers. From this the argument is made by the minority report in this case that Congress cannot delegate to the President its powers to pass a law. Just what does this mean?

Congress, for example, has the power to prescribe the exact rate that should be charged by a railroad for carrying a specified commodity from one point to another. As a practical proposition, Congress said to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "Put forth rates that are just and reasonable." And so not only the statute books of Congress but of each of the States in the Union are filled with instances in which Congress or the State legislature has found it necessary to delegate power and authority to persons holding an office in the executive department.

To illustrate: A State legislature may conclude to specify the hours of school and the courses of study. They may prefer to let a school board decide these questions.

Out of all of this comes the kind of law which the lawyers call administrative law. By this is meant the law declared by those who administer the law as distinguished from those who enact the law and those who interpret the law.

At this point we are approaching the precise question that was raised in the case under the McKinley tariff bill and which is raised in the case of the pending bill.

The minority members of the Ways and Means Committee insist that the pending measure gives the President the power of life and death over tariff rates, and which powers they say are too broad and in fact legislative in character and essence, and therefore unconstitutional. The question is, Does Congress, in the pending bill, give the President directions that are as definite as the law requires them to be or does the bill permit the President to use his own discretion and do as he pleases without any law or restrictions to govern him? The minority of the committee are compelled to admit that the precise direction in the McKinley tariff bill has been held valid. That direction undertakes to prescribe this test:

If the President deems that certain duties imposed by other countries on the agricultural or other products of the United States which, in view of free introduction of certain specified articles into the United States, "he may deem reciprocally unequal and unreasonable", he shall have power to suspend the free list on the articles specified and subject them to a duty.

The bill we are now considering prescribes this test: Whenever the President—

Finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States—

He may enter into reciprocal trade arrangement with foreign countries, and proclaim a modification of tariff rates within certain specified limitations.

So the whole question after all is this, taking as our guide Field against Clark, is the test in the bill now before the House valid? And I submit it measures up to the yardstick required by the decisions of the courts on the subject.

Of course, it is easy on the floor of Congress (notwithstanding the protestations of our friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] to the contrary), for some Members to be oracles on constitutional law. No man suffers in reputation because he disagrees in advance with the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

At the present writing, when our friends the Republican Party are claiming that they, and not the Democratic Party, are the guardians of the Constitution and the champions of individualism, it is, at first blush, hard to see just how a man can believe in individualism and the protective tariff at the same time. For certainly, the numerous duties imposed and restrictions created by the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill do not give an individual many rights peculiar to him except that of paying duties.

The doctrine of individualism, as I understand, is that the welfare of an individual, his right to live his own life in his own way, is the predominant concern of government. But levying duties on all who import, in order that a few who produce may get higher prices for their products, is scarcely allowing an importer to be individualistic, to import things in his own way.

Against this doctrine of individualism we are reminded that no man liveth unto himself alone, and we plead the State motto of Missouri:

Let the welfare of the people be the supreme law.

As to being guardians of the Constitution, neither political party has any monopoly of that duty. We are grateful that prior to 1868, when the Democratic Party was in power most of the time, only one act of Congress relating to a substantial right, had been declared invalid.

When Mr. Lincoln became President the Supreme Court of the United States decided his action in making it possible for a civilian in a State which had not seceded to be arrested and tried before a court martial, and not before a jury, was illegal.

And the action of a Republican Congress during the Civil War in issuing greenbacks, was once held invalid, and a change in the membership of the Court brought about a decision upholding the right.

The income tax law passed in the administration of Mr. Cleveland was held invalid by a vote of 5 to 4. We kept the Philippines (so Mr. Dooley observed), because whether or not, the Constitution follows the flag, the Supreme Court follows the election returns, and with 4 judges on each side of the question and 1 in the middle, the American flag continued to fly in Manila.

Recently, two important cases were decided by a vote of 5 to 4. So, our friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], who spoke Saturday, was at least in the yellow zone, between green and red, when he withheld (what all of us feel we know), what he thinks about the pending bill.

If we fail to enact this measure, we may be deprived of its benefits, and we may never know just how much we have lost. Some day the Court may uphold a similar law as to a minor detail of government, and we may suffer the regrets which came from the omission of duty not performed.

Pass the pending bill and if invalid, the Court will so declare and no harm will have been done, for an act held to be unconstitutional is as nothing, no law, and as if never enacted.

We are dealing not only with our own national interest, but with the peace and prosperity of a world. The time for plain speaking is at hand. A man who really believes a proposed law is unconstitutional, does not worry about its passage. He knows in course of time, its invalidity will be declared, and in the meantime, he lets things ride and allows the procession to go by. So when our friends of the minority attack the proposed law on account of its alleged unconstitutionality, they are using tactics often indulged in by both Republicans and Democrats in similar circumstances, no doubt hoping to raise an issue productive of votes at the next election.

We find the battle line for 1934 pitched in an article in New York Herald Tribune of March 25, 1934, by Mark Sullivan, a mouthpiece of the Hoover administration, intimating, without saying so, in so many words, that the Republican Party is trying to hold America "to the principles embodied in the Constitution, and to the familiar American traditions of individual liberty." Such is the smoke screen now being laid in which those who are on the outside looking in, so far as national affairs are concerned, are seeking, like the Greeks of old at the siege of Troy, to enter national affairs by the use of a wooden horse.

I have adverted to the constitutionality of the McKinley bill and of the pending law, because both are valid, and by the same square and compass.

The Republicans lost the congressional elections in 1890. The rates charged in the McKinley bill were too strong a dose for the patient under treatment, the long-suffering American populace, and they rebelled.

In 1892 the Democratic Party stood on this declaration of principle:

RECIPROCITY

Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith.

The Republican Party, tested by its platform, still believed in reciprocity in 1892.

TRIUMPH OF RECIPROCITY

We point to the success of the Republican policy of reciprocity, under which our export trade has vastly increased and new and enlarged markets have been opened for the products of our farms and workshops.

And it had this to say about the so-called "nonexistent" foreign commerce mentioned in the minority report on the pending bill:

We favor the extension of our foreign commerce.

In 1892 the Democrats elected Mr. Cleveland. The Wilson-Gorman bill, passed by a Democratic Congress, repealed the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley tariff bill and abrogated the McKinley tariff bill and the McKinley tariff treaties. All this brought forth a Republican protest in the platform of 1896:

RECIPROCITY

We believe the repeal of the reciprocity arrangements negotiated by the last Republican administration was a national calamity, and we demand their renewal and extension on such terms as will equalize our trade with other nations, remove the restrictions which now obstruct the sale of American products in the ports of other countries, and secure enlarged markets for the products of our farms, forests, and factories.

Protection and reciprocity are twin measures of Republican policy and go hand in hand. Democratic rule has recklessly struck down both, and both must be reestablished. Protection for what we produce; free admission for the necessities of life which we do not produce; reciprocity agreements of mutual interests which gain open markets for us in return for our open market to others. Protection builds up domestic industry and trade and secures our own market for ourselves; reciprocity builds up foreign trade and finds an outlet for our surplus.

The administration of William McKinley produced the Dingley tariff bill (1897), reviving a peculiar brand of reciprocity, a brand which did not include conciliation and agreement, but one based exclusively on retaliation and punishment, just as the McKinley and the Payne-Aldrich bills did.

All of these enactments, claiming to be reciprocal, depended solely on one thought:

If you, a foreign nation, deal unfairly with us, we will slap back and hit you in the face.

Business, whenever possible, should not preach the gospel of force or retaliation, but of good will, of conciliation, of agreement.

The dominant thought in the pending bill, the Roosevelt idea, is primarily the idea of being a good neighbor, engaging in agreement and understanding, and using prohibitive measures as a last resort and only when all else has failed.

The Fordney-McCumber bill and the Hawley-Smoot bill abandoned the phases of so-called "reciprocity" contained in the McKinley bill, the Dingley bill, and Payne-Aldrich bill, and introduced another test, which is not reciprocity at all but exclusion.

Reciprocity means to admit on terms that are fair to both sides, but the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot bills look to exclusion, the fixing of the tariff at a point based on the difference in the domestic and foreign cost of production, a test in its very nature almost impossible of just application.

In 1900 the Republican platform referred to the growth of export trade and to reciprocity in these words:

GROWTH OF EXPORT TRADE

No single fact can more strikingly tell the story of what Republican government means to the country than this: That while during the whole period of 107 years, from 1790 to 1897, there was an excess of exports over imports of only $383,028,497, there has been in the short 3 years of the present Republican administration an excess of exports over imports in the enormous sum of $1,483,537,094.

RECIPROCITY FAVORED

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce in return for free foreign markets.

Theodore Roosevelt became President in 1901. He had been educated at Harvard University, and as a young man had made a free speech. As revealed by his daughter, Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth, in a recent magazine article, "Father never thought much of the tariff." No tariff legislation was enacted during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt.

In 1904 the Democratic platform had this to say on the subject of reciprocity:

We favor liberal trade arrangements with Canada and with peoples of other countries where they can be entered into with benefit to American agriculture, manufactures, mining, or commerce.

The Republican platform in 1904 contains this contribution to the literature on the subject:

We have extended widely our foreign markets, and we believe in the adoption of all practicable methods for their further extension, including commercial reciprocity wherever reciprocal arrangements can be effected consistent with the principles of protection and without injury to American agriculture, American labor, or any American industry.

In 1908 the Republican platform dropped reciprocity, drowned its foster child, and boasted that America "makes one third of the modern manufactured products", an output self-evidently needing foreign markets as a customer.

As an advent of the Executive administration of the tariff, the Republican Party in 1908 recommended—

The establishment of a maximum and minimum rate to be administered by the President under limitations fixed by law—and called for the establishment of a merchant marine so essential to enlargement of avenues of trade. Why should we want avenues of trade, if there are no foreign markets, as claimed in the minority report?

The Congressional elections of 1910 and the election of Woodrow Wilson in 1912 was the answer of the American people to the Taft administration and the Payne-Aldrich bill. Ten Republican Senators, including such names as Beveridge, Dolliver, La Follette, and Norris voted against that bill.

As indicating the inability of Congress to deal with the tariff efficiently, the 1912 platform of the Republican Party made this statement:

The pronounced feature of modern industrial life is its enormous diversification. To apply tariff rates to these changing conditions, requires closer study and more scientific methods than ever before.

In this document, on which the Republican Party was victorious in two States (Utah and Vermont), no mention is made of reciprocity.

In 1916 the Republican Party favored the continuance of Republican policies—

Which will result in drawing more and more closely the commercial, financial, and social relations between this country and the countries of Latin America.

In 1920 reciprocity was still on a vacation so far as the Republican Party was concerned. And, as to agriculture, the Grand Old Party in 1920 was still ignorant of its latest discovery, no export markets, and pleaded for the encouragement of our export trade.

In 1924 the Republican Party recorded this statement in its platform:

We have greatly strengthened our foreign marketing service for the disposal of our agricultural products.

This platform also called for a—

Merchant marine to secure the necessary contact with world markets for the sale of our surplus agricultural and manufactured products.

In 1928 the Republican platform stated:

The Republican Party has always given and will continue to give its support to the development of American foreign trade, which makes for domestic prosperity. During the administration of President Coolidge extraordinary strides have been made in opening up new markets for American produce and manufacture. Through these foreign contacts a mutually better international understanding has been reached which aids in the maintenance of world peace.

It was also stated that under President Coolidge "waterways have been deepened and widened for ocean commerce." Why spend money in deepening and widening our waterways for ocean commerce, if our quest for foreign trade is a wild goose chase and no foreign markets exist, as the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee would have you believe?

At the time Mr. Hoover was a candidate for President in 1928, his friend and classmate, Will Irwin, wrote a book extolling the work of Mr. Hoover and devoted a chapter to the subject of foreign commerce.

Immediately upon his election Mr. Hoover, the great apostle of foreign trade, started on a good-will tour to South America. Why? To promote international good will, with foreign commerce as an incident thereto. Speaking at Cutuco, El Salvador, on November 26, 1928, he said:

We perhaps hear more of economic and trade relations between countries than any other one subject in the field of international life. This may be easily explained, for out of our economic life do we build up the foundations upon which other progress rests. And our international economic relations can have but one real foundation. They can grow only out of the prosperity of each of us. They cannot flourish in the poverty or degeneration of any of us. Our economic progress is mutual. It is not competitive. We each of us have the responsibility to carry forward such policies within our own countries which, in the long view, will contribute to our individual prosperity. The long view of our prosperity must, however, embrace the recognition of the mutuality of prosperity among the whole of us.

We have now reached the Republican convention of 1932. From far and near, a horde of Republican officeholders, in the guise of delegates, gathered to yield homage to their chief, to point again with pride to Republicanism and view with alarm the onslaughts of Democracy, and to endeavor again to perpetuate the ascendancy in national affairs which the Republican Party had attained.

On June 14, 1932, Senator DICKINSON, of Iowa, as temporary chairman, Republican National Convention (75 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 14111), denounced the Democratic Party for proposing—

To a free American people that they take this purely domestic question (the tariff) to a conference table around which would sit the representatives of the other nations of the world.

He said of the American people:

They will refuse to allow foreign nations to determine their economic destinies.

At the very time Senator Dickinson was making the somewhat toploftical statement just quoted and attempting to wrap about America a cloak of national isolation, the economic forces of the world, without waiting for the advice or consent of America, were in effect determining our economic destinies. All this is clearly shown in the remarks of Mr. Hoover hereinafter quoted, who pointed out with great force that willy-nilly the economic destinies of America depended upon the prosperity of the world.

As to foreign trade, we cannot, like the Arabs, fold up our tents and silently steal away whenever we determine as a matter of bookkeeping and of statistics that foreign trade is either nonexistent or nonprofitable. As Mr. Hoover explained, foreign trade is but one of the items in the large and comprehensive program of world prosperity.

Mr. SNELL, of New York, as permanent chairman of the convention, claimed that the Republican Party had protected the American market against invasion from foreign shores. He said:

Americans have had the advantage of a monopoly in their own market, the greatest consuming market in the world. This market belongs to them, and the Republican Party protects it for them (75 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 14113).

Of course, Mr. SNELL, at Chicago, on June 14, 1932, when he made the statement just quoted, must have realized, as a man of great ability, ripe experience, and mature judgment, that if Americans claimed a monopoly of the home market, they were engaged in a game in which other nations had the right to claim the same thing with respect to their home markets, and thus utterly destroy our foreign trade.

In striking contrast with these exuberant keynote speeches, let us examine the Republican platform of 1932. That document referred to the emergency "as that of a great war", and to the creation of Federal Farm Board:

To promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

As to foreign affairs:

The facilitation of world intercourse, the freeing of commerce from unnecessary impediments * * * have been and will be our party program.

Reference was made to the inestimable benefits which will accrue to the Nation from placing the ports of the Great Lakes on an ocean base. Why should we be interested in having our lake ports on an ocean base, if there are no foreign markets?

In view of the intimation of the minority of House Ways and Means Committee that in reaching for foreign commerce we are engaged in a wild goose chase, attention is called to some Republican expenditures. By an act approved April 18, 1930 (Herbert Hoover, President), the following sums were appropriated to be expended in investigations for the promotion and development of the foreign commerce of the United States:

Europe and other areas.....	$900,000
Latin America.....	520,000
Far East.....	419,000
Africa.....	106,000
To investigate export industries.....	973,000
China Trade Act.....	30,800
To collect and compile lists of foreign buyers.....	78,700
To investigate foreign trade restrictions.....	62,440
Total.....	3,089,940

On December 5, 1932, President Hoover transmitted to Congress the Budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934. At page XVII of his message he said:

A large excess of expenditures with consequent increase in the public debt is anticipated for the current fiscal year—

And urged that every effort be made to limit expenditures.

But evidently President Hoover appreciated the importance of building up our foreign trade, because he recommended the following expenditures for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933:

Promoting commerce
Europe and other areas.....	$655,815
Latin America.....	431,220
Far East.....	361,860
Africa.....	85,000
District and cooperative offices.....	508,920
China Trade Act.....	17,300
Export industries.....	747,800
Compiling foreign-trade statistics.....	263,950
List of foreign buyers.....	59,890
Investigation of foreign-trade restrictions.....	50,240
Allowance for quarters foreign-trade service.....	91,400
Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Department of Agriculture, on account "Foreign competition and demand".....	298,800
Total.....	3,572,195

In his address of acceptance at Washington, D.C., on August 11, 1932, President Hoover, speaking of the evil effects of overproduction and the speculative mania, said:

* * * Three years ago came retribution by the inevitable world-wide slump in consumption of goods, in prices, and employment.

He then referred to a blow abroad—

Of such dangerous character as to strike at the very safety of the Republic.

New blows from decreasing world consumption of goods and from failing financial systems rained upon us. We are part of a world the disturbance of whose remotest populations affects our financial system, our employment, our markets, and the prices of our farm products. Thus, beginning 18 months ago, the world-wide storm rapidly grew to hurricane force and the greatest economic emergency in all history.

Foreign countries, in the face of their own failures * * * withdrew from the United States $2,400,000,000, including a billion in gold. Our own alarmed citizens withdrew over one billion six hundred million of currency from our banks into hoarding. These actions, combined with the fears they generated, caused a shrinkage of credit available for conduct of industry and commerce by several times these vast sums. Its visible expression was banks and business failures, demoralization of security and real property values, commodity prices, and employment. This was but one of the invading forces of destruction.

He said of his administration:

We have cooperated to restore and stabilize the situation abroad.

Calvin Coolidge (New York, Oct. 11, 1932) said:

The present economic distress is world-wide.

In his speech of acceptance at Washington, D.C., August 11, 1932, Mr. Hoover referred to the German moratorium he was instrumental in accomplishing:

We (that is, America), stemmed the tide of collapse in Germany, and the consequent ruin of its people, with its repercussion on all other nations of the world.

* * * We have joined in the development of a world economic conference to bulwark the whole international fabric of finance monetary values, and the expansion of world commerce.

At Des Moines, Iowa, October 4, 1932, speaking from the heart out, to the old home folks, face to face, as a man speaks to a friend, Mr. Hoover referred to a storm which embraced the whole world, including China, Patagonia, Germany, Australia, England, and every farm in Iowa. He spoke of contending with forces at home and abroad which still threatened the safety of civilization. He said to the people of Iowa:

You know the stifling of your markets from the collapse of other nations under the calamities they have inherited from the war.

Mr. Hoover said that low price levels of agricultural products were—

Due to the decreased demand for farm products by our millions of unemployed and by foreign countries.

He also in his Des Moines speech referred to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway as a—Great contribution to the strengthening of Midwest agriculture in reaching out for world markets.

Also at Des Moines—

I cannot overemphasize the importance of the element of world stability in the recovery and expansion of our agricultural markets.

As to war debts, he spoke of foreign nations offering a tangible form of compensation such as the expansion of markets for American agriculture, and was sure our citizens would consider such a proposal.

Continuing at Des Moines in 1932—

I am prepared to recommend that any annual payment on the foreign debt be used for the specific purpose of securing an expansion of the foreign markets for American agriculture. * * * That is a proposal of more importance to the farmer than any panacea. Whenever we properly can * * * we are joining for the rehabilitation of the world, and thereby the foreign markets for agricultural products.

In his New York speech, referring to the enactment of a tariff bill by Congress, Mr. Coolidge said:

Because of constantly changing conditions, if for no other reason, no one was ever able to devise a perfectly adjusted tariff bill. No one can devise it now, and no Congress, constituted as ours is, ever will.

In his speech of acceptance Mr. Hoover said, referring to the Tariff Commission:

That instrumentality enables us to correct any injustice and to readjust the rates of duty to shifting economic changes without constant tinkering and orgies of logrolling in Congress.

In his speech at Des Moines, Iowa, October 4, 1932, the opening speech of his campaign, Mr. Hoover said:

By maintaining that reform the country need no longer be faced with heartbreaking, logrolling selfishness and greed which come to the surface on every occasion when Congress revises the tariff.

These statements quoted from Mr. Coolidge and from Mr. Hoover are a conclusive argument in favor of Executive administration of tariff details.

At Cleveland, Ohio, on October 15, 1932, Mr. Hoover said of foreign nations:

But if it is possible to improve the internal stability of other nations, it would at once allow them to relax their emergency restrictions against exchange and the import of commodities; it would allow them to return to stable currencies and enable the world to be free from political shocks—all of which build for American markets for the American farmer and for American labor.

At St. Paul, Minn., on November 5, he referred to the troubles of the world:

The new nationalism of a score of small nations sprung from the war, with all their own tariff walls and disturbances to old channels of trade.

These blows struck at us through world consumption of goods.

Mr. Hoover recognized the problem of foreign trade could not be solved in dollars and cents, and that certain factors connected therewith were inescapable. He said in his St. Paul speech:

Our own economists overlooked one great fundamental factor—that while our own people consume 90 percent of their production, yet no one calculated the effect of world-wide fear upon our credit system which thereby suddenly undermined our industry and consumers.

Let those gentlemen who signed the minority report on the pending bill, in which they tacitly accepted nationalism as an accepted fact, as unalterable as the law of the Medes and Persians, take to heart these words of Herbert Hoover at the close of his campaign on November 5, 1932, at a time when he recognized the tide of reelection was running against him, and he was throwing into the battle he was then waging every armament of which he was possessed:

We are a part of the world, the disturbance of whose remotest population affects our financial system, our markets, our employments, and the prices of our farm products.

At Salt Lake, Utah, on November 7, 1932, he referred to the blow to agriculture arising through depreciation of currencies in 30 governments.

Again I ask the minority, if we are to be nationalists, if there are no foreign markets, what concern have we with the depreciated currencies of other nations?

Now, I submit to an intelligent jury, the American people, these statements of Senator DICKINSON and Mr. SNELL, as the temporary and permanent chairmen of the Republican Convention, 1932, of Mr. Hoover, still the titular head of his party, and the minority report of the House Committee on Ways and Means, signed by 10 Republicans, like certain chemical elements, such as oil and water, do not mix, for these reasons:

(a) The report of the Republican minority of the committee on the pending bill refers to a so-called "wild-goose chase in search of export markets that do not exist" and claiming that "nationalism is the keynote of all people at the present time. The various countries of the world are constantly becoming less dependent upon each other." I am quoting from the report of the minority Committee on Ways and Means on the pending bill.

(b) Senator DICKINSON and Mr. SNELL both repelled the idea of the United States having anything to do with the rest of the world.

(c) Mr. Hoover, out of the wealth of his experience, 7 years Secretary of Commerce and, at the time of the remarks I have quoted, over 3 years in the Presidency, pleading in his campaign for reelection at an hour when, of all times, his words had to be measured, pleaded for foreign markets for American products and a recognition of world unity.

Whom are we to believe? Was Mr. Hoover, in December 1932, when he recommended an expenditure of over $3,000,000 in promoting foreign commerce, at a time when he was also recommending economy in governmental expenditures, so ignorant of world conditions that he had not discovered what the minority of the committee claim to have discovered, that world markets are drying up?

Did they know this when they voted for appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce?

Either our friends of the minority are mistaken as to world markets, or Mr. Hoover was the most wasteful and ignorant man who ever held public office, and I do not charge him with either ignorance or intentional wastefulness in expenditures of public funds.

What shall we say of the Republican Senators who voted for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway on the theory it would benefit foreign commerce? Not a single Senator in a long and closely contested debate discovered the permanent drying up of foreign markets. Certain Senators voted for the treaty because Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, and Minnesota would have ocean ports within their borders. Other Senators voted against the treaty because they desired to have foreign commerce flow through the Atlantic seaboard or down the Mississippi River.

If these gentlemen of the minority are correct, and we have no foreign markets, then we should abandon our merchant marine to its fate, hang a sign "no admittance" upon our outer wall, tear down the Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, cease to promote international aviation, and abolish the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, at least insofar as it relates to foreign trade.

At New York City, on March 22, 1934, less than a week ago, Ogden L. Mills, a potential candidate for President, a former Member of this House, a former Secretary of the Treasury, argued for an international gold standard, claiming that "the growth of international trade is being seriously hampered by lack of one." Mr. Mills should write for a copy of the minority report on the bill under discussion and get up-to-date.

Mr. Mills also said a curb was needed on extreme nationalism, and explained:

This means that in the world field extreme nationalism, aiming at complete local self-sufficiency, should be curbed and that those policies that are at present stifling international trade, such as excessive tariff quotas, exchange restrictions, etc., must be gradually relaxed.

I am willing to cast my lot for economic freedom.

With patience, self-restraint, and justifiable faith in ourselves, in our institutions, and with just a little more human wisdom and cooperation on the part of mankind, this generation will yet wake to see the dawn of a new day.

Former President Coolidge, a very cautious man in the use of words, of large experience in public life, at Northampton, Mass., on November 7, 1932, made this statement:

The business of the United States Government is very intricate and involved. It cannot be brought within the comprehension of a single address or begin to be understood without long contemplation. Very few could claim to understand it in its broader outlines. We have to intrust ourselves somewhat to expert leaders.

* * * We know whom we can trust to serve us faithfully in meeting any difficulty in which we are involved.

I am willing to take the advice of President Roosevelt and Secretaries Hull, Wallace, and Roper and vote for this bill.

In all the trying days that have intervened between March 4, 1933, and today no one has impugned Cordell Hull. Whether attending a World Economic Conference at London, or a similar conference in South America, or at his desk in Washington, he stands out as a beacon light, without fear and without reproach.

(f) Henry A. Wallace left the Republican Party on the issue of the protective tariff. As head of the Department of Agriculture, he has a world of information at hand which none of us can hope to equal.

Daniel C. Roper, the head of our Department of Commerce, is another speaking as one having authority.

I am glad we have men in public life like John Dickinson, of our Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, author of a law book in which the cases are assembled to the effect the pending bill is valid.

I am thankful to Massachusetts for the education Francis B. Sayre enjoyed in that State and now devoted to the public service, a man in whose children's veins flows the blood of Woodrow Wilson, a man imbued with the spirit of that great leader, and seeking to translate into terms of action the things for which Woodrow Wilson labored and endured.

After a careful study of the bill, in the light of the economic and constitutional history of the principle of reciprocity, in the light of the circumstances to which the bill when enacted will apply, and of the evil to be remedied, I have reached the conclusion:

(a) The proposed legislation is constitutional;

(b) The proposed legislation evidences a wise public policy and is a forward step in the rehabilitation and recovery of a distressed world;

(c) The objections urged in opposition are unfounded in point of fact, have no basis in law, and are made only as a part of a determined effort to discredit the President in his efforts to relieve the economic distress of the world; and

(d) Just as the Republicans trusted in Benjamin Harrison in 1890, we may at this day and hour trust in Franklin D. Roosevelt to administer the law wisely and well. Believing as I do, this bill shall have my vote and my support, both here and in the campaign in which we are engaged. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, having the utmost confidence in President Roosevelt's honesty and sincerity, and believing in him as I do, that his aims are for the best interests of the whole Nation, which, of course, includes the interests of the veterans of the Nation, and knowing the reasons he assigned in vetoing the independent offices appropriation bill, I was honor-bound to vote to sustain his veto. And it is for the same reasons that I shall vote and support the pending tariff bill before the House.

As one who advocated taking the tariff out of politics and voting for reciprocity agreements, which I consider would give the President the power of securing more favorable trade relationship with other nations which would enable us to find an outlet for our tremendous surpluses, I believe that his recommendations to this House are sound. Nobody can deny his sincerity, honesty, or ability to obtain for the country the most advantageous trade agreements possible. It cannot be denied by any fair man that the President has accomplished a great deal in the short space of 1 year, and it might be well at this time to familiarize the people, especially those in my district, with the reasons given for vetoing the independent offices appropriation bill. I hope that all of the loyal and patriotic veterans, not only in my district but throughout the entire Nation, appreciate that it is the President's desire to treat them fairly and justly and that he really has their best interests at heart. The President's veto says:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval H.R. 6663, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes." I am impelled to do this on a number of grounds, any one of them sufficient to require disapproval of the bill.

In March 1933 the Congress passed, and I signed, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government." This law became one of the principal pillars of national recovery for the clear reason that for the first time in many years the recurring annual expenses for the maintenance of the Government were brought within the current revenues of the Government. It is true that very large but wholly distinct funds are being dispensed daily for emergency purposes, but these funds are going directly to the purpose of saving farms, saving homes, and giving relief and employment to millions of our fellow citizens. They are non-recurring in nature, while the increases contemplated in this bill are continuous and permanent.

Furthermore, the Budget submitted by me to the Congress on January 4, 1934, laid down a definite program of expenditures and a definite estimate of receipts. Because of the emergency expenditures for relief and unemployment, the expected total deficits this year and in 1935 are necessarily large; but at the same time a program for a completely balanced Budget by June 30, 1936, was determined upon as a definite objective.

This bill exceeds the estimates submitted by me in the sum of $228,000,000. I am compelled to take note of the fact that in creating this excess the Congress has failed at the same time to provide a similar sum by additional taxation. Moreover, to the extent that the amount of money appropriated by the Congress is in excess of my Budget estimates, and in the absence of provision for additional revenues, there must be a decrease in the funds available for essential relief work.

This bill increases the compensation for employees of the United States Government $125,000,000 over my Budget estimates for this purpose. I have great sympathy for the employees, but I cannot forget that millions of American citizens are today still without employment, and reduction in the compensation of Federal employees has been and still is on the average less than the reduction in compensation that has been patiently endured by those citizens not in the employ of the United States Government.

Let me be specific. This bill makes a portion of the restored compensation retroactive to February 1, 1934. I believe it unwise to establish this precedent, and I cannot overlook the serious administrative difficulties involved in paying back pay to individuals, many of whom are no longer in the employ of the Government.

The bill also contains several discriminatory provisions, such as paying employees in some departments of the Government 43 hours' pay for 40 hours' work.

In submitting the Budget estimates last December, I recommended compensation restoration of 5 percent for the next fiscal year. The cost of living seems to be rising slowly. The present authority is not responsive enough to changing conditions. I therefore shall be glad to confer with the Congress on improving the methods of restoring Federal pay so that in actual practice the pay will keep ahead of the cost-of-living increases instead of lagging behind. Adjustments can well be made immediately on the passage of appropriate legislation, followed by more frequent adjustments in the future.

I come now to the provisions in this act relating to World War veterans. First let me speak of principles. Last October I said this to the American Legion convention:

"The first principle, following inevitably from the obligation of citizens to bear arms, is that the Government has a responsibility for and toward those who suffered injury or contracted disease while serving in its defense.

"The second principle is that no person, because he wore a uniform, must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens. The fact of wearing a uniform does not mean that he can demand and receive from his Government a benefit which no other citizen receives. It does not mean that because a person served in the defense of his country, performed a basic obligation of citizenship, he should receive a pension from his Government because of a disability incurred after his service had terminated, and not connected with that service.

"It does mean, however, that those who were injured in or as a result of their service are entitled to receive adequate and generous compensation for their disabilities. It does mean that generous care shall be extended to the dependents of those who died in or as a result of service to their country."

I am very confident that the American people, including the overwhelming majority of veterans themselves, approve these principles and in the last analysis will support them.

Applying them to the provisions of this bill I cannot give it my approval.

Last year it was determined—and I had hoped permanently—that a service-connected disability is a question of fact rather than a question of law. In other words each individual case should and must be considered on its merits and there is no justification for legislative dicta which, contrary to fact, provide that thousands of individual cases of sickness which commenced 4, 5, or 6 years after the termination of the war are caused by war service. Therefore local boards were established—boards on which 3 out of the 5 members were in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and on which two thirds of those serving were ex-service men. These local boards approved disallowances in the cases of 29,000 veterans and these decisions were unanimous in 94 percent of the cases. Not content with that, I created a Board of Appeals, the majority of which again are in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and a majority of which are ex-service men. This Board is now engaged in hearing appeals of those cases disallowed by the local boards.

A few weeks ago I gave approval to an amendment the purpose of which was, pending the determination of their appeals, to restore to the rolls at 75 percent of their compensation those veterans in whose cases the presumption of service connection was disallowed by the local boards. This, however, was rejected in the Congress. I intend now by regulation forthwith to direct an appeal by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in each and every one of these disallowed 29,000 cases with the further direction that in the final determination of these cases every reasonable doubt be resolved in favor of the veteran, and every assistance be rendered in the preparation and presentation of these cases. While these cases are pending the veterans will be paid 75 percent of the compensation they received prior to the time they were removed from the rolls. If the appeal is allowed they will receive back compensation. Only in cases disallowed by the Board of Appeals will the veteran thereafter be permanently removed from the rolls. This regulation will be put into effect at once.

By reason of the fact that many totally and permanently disabled veterans have been the recipients of benefits from their Government for a long period of time, it is difficult, in the event of a disallowance of service connection by the final Board of Appeals, to remove them completely from the rolls. Existing regulations therefore provide that if their cases are disallowed, and if they are found to be totally and permanently disabled, they shall, notwithstanding fundamental principles enunciated, if in need, receive $30 a month and domiciliary care and hospitalization.

It is a simple and undeniable fact that the United States, in terms of compensation and in terms of hospitalization, has done and is doing infinitely more for our veterans and their dependents than any other government.

I come now to the provisions of the bill relating to Spanish-American War veterans. To this group of ex-service men I have devoted much thought. Because of their age, they command sympathy. Nevertheless, we must recognize also that many abuses have crept into the laws granting them benefits.

The Spanish-American War veterans' amendment to this act provides for service pensions. This violates the principles upon which benefits to veterans should be paid and the principles to which I have referred in this message. Moreover, if that principle should in the future be applied to the World War veterans at the same rate as contemplated for Spanish-American War veterans by this bill, the annual and continuing charge upon the people of this country by 1949 will amount to more than $830,000,000 for that item alone. This would be in addition to the large cost of all existing veterans' benefits and future hospitalization. This I cannot approve.

However, I am today directing the restoration to the rolls of those Spanish-American War veterans who in 1920 were receiving pensions as a result of having sustained an injury or incurred a disease arising out of their war service.

By regulation 12 a presumption of service origin was extended to Spanish-American War veterans on the rolls on March 19, 1933. In order to take the same action which I am taking in regard to World War veterans, I am directing the restoration to the rolls, as of this date, at 75 percent of the amount they were receiving on March 19, 1933, all Spanish-American War veterans pending a final determination of their cases before the Board of Appeals.

Without going further into all of the details relating to the treatment—past, present, and future—of Spanish-American War veterans, it seems sufficient to repeat that I am wholly and irrevocably opposed to the principle of the general service pension, but I do seek to provide with liberality for all those who suffered because of their service in that war. As in the case of World War veterans, I shall not hesitate to further alter or modify the regulations in order that substantial justice may be done in every individual case.

What you and I are seeking is justice and fairness in the individual case. I call your specific attention to the fact that since the original regulations were established a year ago, actual experience has shown many cases where these regulations required modification. I have not hesitated to take the necessary action and have issued regulations which have made many changes. These changes, based on principles of justice to the individual veteran, involve additional expenditures of approximately $117,000,000. It goes without saying that I shall not hesitate to make further changes if the principles of justice demand them.

On the basis of the original regulations following the Economy Act, the annual cost to the United States of veterans' relief was $486,000,000. Since that time, by Executive order, the addition of $117,000,000 increases to $603,000,000 the total cost for veterans' relief for the fiscal year 1935.

My disapproval of this bill is not based solely on the consideration of dollars and cents. There is a deeper consideration. You and I are concerned with the principles herein enunciated. I trust that the Congress will continue to cooperate with me in our common effort, to restore general prosperity and relieve distress.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

Mr. Chairman, the Republicans seem to be jubilant because the President's veto has been overridden. To my mind, however, this will not dim his greatness or lessen the whole-hearted confidence of the American people in him.

THE NEW DEAL VERSUS THE OLD DEAL

Mr. Chairman, everybody, Democrat or Republican, who is familiar with the conditions that existed during the last three Republican administrations under Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover must within his heart of hearts sense a feeling of disgust at the present contemptible tactics of the paid publicity agents of Wall Street, who have left no stone unturned to misrepresent the every act of our noble President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

No matter how high his motives, no matter how sublime his courage, the unscrupulous hirelings of special privilege are ever seeking to undermine his deserved and unprecedented popularity with the men, women, and children of this Nation.

But their mud-slinging tactics are in vain. For the thinking people of this country realize fully now that his election and his determination to give the masses a new and square deal saved the Nation from complete break-down.

REVOLUTION WAS NEAR

On March 4, 1933, the day Franklin Roosevelt was inaugurated as President, this Nation was on the verge of revolution. The banks were failing so fast that all banks had to be temporarily closed to prevent a national catastrophe.

Sixteen million people were out of work. Hundreds of thousands of hungry, yes, starving men and women marched through our streets to city halls, county institutions, and to our State Capitols, demanding work and food. More than 75 percent of our plants and factories were closed, and those that still remained open worked only 2 or 3 days a week, working only 20 to 30 percent of the time. Men were paid $1 per day, and thousands of women $3 per week. More than 50 percent of the stores were closed, manufacturing businesses were thrown into receivers' hands in bankruptcy. Homes were being foreclosed, tenants evicted, State and municipalities not able to feed the hungry or proceed with started works—unable to pay the employees—schools were being closed and children turned out on our streets. In many States court orders were ignored and discontentment and resentment reigned through our land and anarchy and bolshevism grew. Depositors' life savings gone; despair on every side; insane institutions and poorhouses overcrowded; suicides in all walks of life; banks closed, their capital impaired; and insurance companies insolvent, all due to Republican misrule. These all were the handiwork of the well-known Wall Street.

Such was the trail of desolation and despair that marked the end of the old deal under the administrations of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover.

THEN CAME THE NEW DEAL

As I say, these were the conditions on March 4, 1933, when President Roosevelt was inaugurated. On that very day he made clear to the Nation that the system that had brought about these conditions would not be permitted in the future to monopolize the wealth of the country for the aggrandizement solely of the great financial pirates at the expense of the masses. He proclaimed that there would be a new deal, that the laborer in industry, as well as the farmer, henceforth was to be accorded fair treatment.

In his effort to bring relief and aid to the Nation, the President, within a few days after taking office, called a special session of Congress, recommending legislation that would stop discord, reestablish confidence, bring about the reemployment of the millions of American wage earners, the reopening of our plants and factories, eliminate the criminal extravagance that was practiced by former Republican administrations, bring about economy and, if in any way possible, balance the Budget. Since that day many of his recommendations have been enacted into law, and all have tended, as I shall show, to rehabilitate and to reconstruct the wreck and ruin brought about by the former Republican mismanagement and misrule.

WHIPPING THE DEPRESSION

Immediately upon taking office President Roosevelt set about to whip the depression. I could show by thousands of newspaper clippings from all parts of the United States that he has steadily been making progress.

I will content myself for the present, however, by reading a few sentences from this morning's issue of the Washington (D.C.) Post, a strong Republican antiadministration paper.

I see here an Associated Press dispatch from Pittsburgh that—

A general 10-percent pay increase in wages of steel workers, without reduction in the present 40-hour work week, will be granted by the industry on April 1.

The dispatch adds that—

Such an increase will mean a boost of almost $100,000,000 annually in the pockets of the workers.

I submit that bit of evidence from purely Republican sources to my Republican friends as an indication of the undeniable fact that under President Roosevelt's new deal prosperity is no longer "just around the corner" but is now actually appearing on "Main Street". On another page of this morning's same Republican Washington Post I note the following:

BOARD REPORTS CLIMB IN JOBS, PAY, AND OUTPUT—STEEL, AUTOMOBILES, AND TEXTILES SHOW MARKED GAINS, SURVEY REVEALS

[Associated Press]

New increases in industrial activity, factory employment, and pay rolls were reported yesterday by the Federal Reserve Board. Steel, automobiles, and textiles were named especially in the monthly review of business and financial conditions for February and early March.

A $1,000,000,000 increase in deposits of member banks also was noted.

Such items as the above, showing that the President steadily is making headway against the worst depression that any nation has ever known, ought to cause the paid Republican publicity racketeers to hang their heads in shame.

In last night's Washington (D.C.) Star, another Republican, antiadministration paper, I note the following as regards the improving conditions in my own Chicago, which, of course, is especially gratifying to me personally:

Employment gains in Chicago district—Reserve bank reports increase of 6 percent—pay rolls up 14 percent.

I confidently submit that such items as this prove beyond successful contradiction that the President is winning. His success has been due to the fact that he has, with the cooperation of Congress, fought the depression on every front, with a carefully worked-out, constructive program.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND DEMOCRATIC CONGRESS

Mr. Chairman, the people will be interested in having a report of the accomplishments of the present administration, which took charge of Government affairs and entered upon a new deal 1 year ago, March 4, 1933, under the masterful statesmanship of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I briefly give some of these accomplishments:

First. Repeal of prohibition, which has resulted in millions of taxes going into the Treasury instead of to the bootleggers and racketeers.

Second. Tottering banks have been placed on a firm foundation.

Third. Food, clothing, fuel, and shelter have been provided for millions of helpless and needy people through C.W.A. work.

Fourth. Thousands of young men, unable to obtain employment, have found health and usefulness through Civilian Conservation Corps camps.

Fifth. Millions have been put back to work through the National Recovery Act.

Sixth. Funds provided for Public Works building program have put additional millions back to work.

Seventh. Child labor has been practically abolished.

Eighth. A successful campaign has been carried on against crime and racketeering.

Ninth. Machinery has been put in motion to adjust employment differences between employers and employees, and serious trouble has been avoided.

Tenth. The cancelation of fraudulent air-mail contracts.

Eleventh. Frauds upon the public, such as perpetrated in the sale of fraudulent securities, has been stopped by the Federal Securities Act.

Twelfth. Thousands of home owners have saved their homes through the establishment of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Thirteenth. Depositors in banks now have their savings insured and protected.

Fourteenth. Farm relief has been passed by Congress, affording loans to farmers and preventing foreclosure of mortgages. The farmer today is getting more for his products, enabling him to buy manufactured products, which is bound to give additional employment to the workers in our factories and mills.

Fifteenth. Loans have been made to States for unemployment relief and further moneys have been loaned to cities and States for construction, road, and building projects, resulting in the employment of millions and saving them from being placed on relief rolls.

I have gratifyingly supported the President in effecting the passage of all this legislation. I have been with him and for him and will continue to give him 100-percent support.

What would have happened if the President had followed in the footsteps of the old deal instead of giving us the new deal? Let us follow our leader, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who is for the people.

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS ARE FIGHTING FOR THE MASSES

In addition to all of the things that the President has already accomplished, there are other things he is doing, with the aid of Congress, to aid reemployment:

First. Encouraging foreign trade to make more work for our factories.

Second. To create and establish Federal discount banks or some Federal banking medium that will make loans to the small business man or manufacturer so his business can be kept going and more workmen employed.

Third. To increase during the coming summer the number of young men in Civilian Conservation camps until private business can give them employment.

Fourth. The building of housing centers in large cities— and Chicago will be one of the first—which will give work to thousands in razing old buildings and give employment to additional thousands in the building trades in the erection of new buildings.

Fifth. The investigation of the thieving misnamed "protective bondholders committees"; the receivership and bankruptcy rings.

Sixth. The administration and Congress will do their utmost to increase employment and will provide various means of help to relieve people until private business and industry can give them work;

Seventh. The President has already announced himself as in favor of some practical form of old-age pensions which will take care of the needy and aged in their declining days.

Eighth. It is also probable that Congress may soon enact some form of legislation respecting silver that will work to the advantage both of the farmer and the wage earner.

These are but a few of the accomplishments and aims of the President and the Congress. I am proud as a Member of this House to have modestly aided in these things for the relief of the people, and I will continue to do all in my power to bring back better times.

RECOVERY FIGHT TO CONTINUE

Many other recommendations await the action of the Democratic Congress, which recommendations I am satisfied will shortly be enacted into law. As stated by the New York Times and other leading newspapers in 1932, a financial statement compiled bearing on 180 corporations for that year showed a loss of $46,000,000; but the following year of 1933, under President Roosevelt's leadership and the legislation enacted by Congress, these very same corporations show a net profit of $560,000,000. The net farm-income increase in 1933 is 55 percent over 1932. Our revenues show an increase; banks, factories, and businesses have reopened, and over 5,000,000 wage earners have been put back to work. That business is improving is shown by the very newspapers that criticized most severely and found fault with the President's program and achievements; double, and in many instances triple, the amount of advertising appeared in 1933 in these very papers as compared with 1932. Notwithstanding the selfish, unpatriotic Republican leaders and these newspaper beneficiaries, these puppets and industrial leaders, who have been saved through the President's efforts from bankruptcy, wreck and ruin, they are responsible for the most unpatriotic attacks through their propagandists and publicity agents, under the guise of "institutes" and "chambers of commerce", assailing the President in the most vicious and contemptible manner and all for the purpose and in the hope of gaining control of the Nation, that they may in the near future reenthroned their dastardly, destructive, and oppressive policies.

WALL STREET ON THE JOB

Within the last few weeks each and every Member of Congress has received hundreds of letters and telegrams, instigated by the New York and other stock exchanges, assailing and attacking the stock exchange regulation bill, now pending in Congress, which aims to make impossible in the future the unloading of millions of worthless securities and bonds on the public, solely for the financial benefit of the greedy, selfish Wall Street manipulators.

Every industry controlled by Wall Street directors is being utilized to tear down and defeat the President's recovery program, and their publicity agents willfully and maliciously distort facts and malign those who are honestly aiding the President in his program. The extent to which these special-interest agents and propagandists will go is nothing short of amazing. Personally, I am satisfied that no amount of lying and hiding of facts will avail them. The people of America have heard of the Wall Street tax evaders and manipulators, who have unloaded millions upon millions of dollars of worthless securities upon the people and who at the same time have avoided the payment of as much as a single cent in income taxes, under Republican administrations, and who, by fraud and collusion, have obtained refunds of $3,000,000,000 paid under the Democratic administration in 1918, 1919, and 1920. They are so contemptible and stoop so low as to engage the services, wherever they can, and utilize the names of some of our most popular men, whose names, standing, and influence they use in assailing the President and his administration. This they were able to do even with such a splendid man as Colonel Lindbergh, who is speaking now, not as the brave and courageous solo transatlantic flyer, but as a representative of the fraudulent Air Mail Service ring. So also it is as to Colonel Rickenbacker, who speaks now, not as the great war ace, but as the agent of still another corporation that obtained its air-mail contract by fraud and collusion. They even engaged the son of a former President and the sons of former and present Republican United States Senators to aid them in their greedy efforts to obtain or prevent the enactment of improper legislation, and to secure fat, profitable contracts.

ONLY DANGER IS IN REACTIONARY REPUBLICANS

No, Mr. Chairman, and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, there is no danger from the "brain trust", as the Steel Trust hirelings are charging; the danger lies in being confronted with these unscrupulous international and Wall Street investment bankers who control the majority of the large industries in the United States, such control being in a small group of agents, who are holding down over 500 interlocking directorships in these corporations. No; there is no danger from the honest and sincere Democrats, who are sacrificing all to serve the Nation, who live on a mere pittance to serve the country. Whatever danger there is is on the part of those of the Republican Party, whom the President felt he could trust, but many of whom are not in sympathy with his program and are undermining his efforts. The sooner he purges himself of these unworthies, the easier he will be able to accomplish his aims and the better it will be for the Nation. These Republicans have been in control and in positions of trust for 12 years. They have repeatedly demonstrated they have not the interest of the people at heart. They cannot be trusted; they cannot be depended upon. I urge the President, for his own sake, for the country's sake, to get rid of those who are not in accord with his policies. Then, and not until then, will he attain his accomplishments and the good and well-being of 124,000,000 American people, who trust and have implicit confidence in him. Do not permit a few selfish bankers and their agents, the Wall Street wolves in sheep's clothing, to deceive you, Mr. President, as they did Presidents Coolidge and Hoover.

REPUBLICANS WITHOUT A PROGRAM

Mr. Chairman, from the very day that Franklin D. Roosevelt was sworn in as President of the United States, the Republicans have been bewildered. All they have been able to do has been to criticize, without themselves being able to suggest anything better than he has proposed. They are still today utterly without a constructive plan or program.

The Hoover way was to do nothing, and reiterate that prosperity was just around the corner. Time has shown that it was not prosperity, but famine, that was just around the corner.

Roosevelt had a plan and the courage to try it. The people wanted action and Roosevelt, before he had been in office an hour, gave them action.

Why is it that today the entire Nation is behind our President, as it has seldom been behind a President in all the history of our Nation? There are two reasons: One is that he is a man of action. The other is that the people sense that his is the philosophy of Thomas Jefferson and that of the men who signed the immortal Declaration of Independence. Here, for instance, is a sample bit of evidence revealing his adherence to the principles laid down by the founding fathers of the Nation:

SEPTEMBER 1932 — FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT IN HIS SAN FRANCISCO COMMONWEALTH CLUB SPEECH

Every man has a right to life; and this means that he also has a right to a comfortable living. . . . Our Government . . . owes to everyone an avenue to possess himself of a portion of that plenty sufficient for his own needs, through his own work. Every man has a right to his own property, which means a right to be assured . . . in the safety of his savings. . . . If . . . we must restrict the operations of the speculator, the manipulator, even the financier, I believe we must accept the restriction as needful, not to hamper individualism but to protect it.

JULY 4, 1776—DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

All men . . . are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights . . . among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. . . . To secure these rights governments are instituted deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. . . . Whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter . . . it.

President Roosevelt possesses George Washington's patriotism, Thomas Jefferson's democracy, Jackson's courage, Lincoln's humbleness, Theodore Roosevelt's fighting spirit, and Wilson's love for humanity; all seem to be embodied and possessed by our still youthful, vigorous, courageous, and justice-seeking statesman and President of the United States—Franklin Delano Roosevelt!

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the pending bill despite the fact that it concedes to the President powers almost unheard of, and it may be said that I vote for this bill with my tongue in my cheek. However, I believe that we will get nowhere with our present tariff policy, a policy that leads nowhere, unless and until the power is lodged with someone with forceful authority, together with other nations, to raze the huge tariff walls which an intense chauvinism and forced nationalism has erected between nations.

This bill endows the President with power to enter into bilateral and multilateral agreements with other nations in the interest of razing those tariff walls. We enable him by this bill to do by direction what the President may now do by indirection. The President at the present time can, after so-called "investigations" by the Tariff Commission, increase or lower our duties 50 percent. He need not consult the Tariff Commission under the pending measure, but may enter directly into negotiations with foreign nations to increase or decrease duties 50 percent, without taking them from the free list or putting them back on the free list. That is indeed a tremendous power, but I do not think that we should cavil much about the power that we are giving to the President at this juncture. We have been giving stupendous powers to the President. We have given him powers which require a man who is almost superhuman to carry out—under the N.R.A., the A.A.A., the Public Works Administration Act, and the Civil Works Administration Act, and what not. So, I repeat, it is idle to chatter about the power that we give to the President under this particular act, in the light of the tremendous powers that we have given him under the acts passed since he was inaugurated.

However, I believe it is well to put some brake upon this power, and at the proper time, if there be no gag rule, and we have the right to offer such an amendment, I say to the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that I should deem it a privilege to offer an amendment putting some time limit upon that power, because while I am willing to trust the President, who shall be in office probably far beyond the 3 years more that he has to go for his first term—I am sure that he is going to be elected for a second time—yet, nevertheless, I do not believe this tremendous power should endure for a period beyond 3 years, the end of the President's first term, and if, after that experimental period, our commerce, our transshipments of goods, our imports, and exports shall have increased in pursuance of our expectations, we can then renew the power. In this bill you give to the Executive the right to modify the existing duties within a 50-percent range. He has a right to impose import restrictions, he has the right to retaliate upon those countries which discriminate against American commerce, and as the bill reads "or for any other reason", which is a sort of basket clause, which increases the power the President has.

He can do almost anything in his discretion without let or hindrance, and these powers are to be exercised by Presidential proclamation. He may terminate by such proclamation in whole or in part what he has given or what he has taken away in reference thereto. There is to be reasonably inferred from these words and from a careful reading of the bill that these powers given to the President are not temporary powers, merely for an emergency. The clear implication is that this is to be a permanent policy. What I say now I say with all due respect to the great constitutional lawyers in the House, but when we realize that there is some doubt as to the constitutional grant of these powers, certainly we must pause when we contemplate the grant of such vast powers. There is an impingement upon the right of the other Chamber to determine treaties. We impinge upon the right which we maintain in this House that we shall be the House to levy taxes in the first instance. There is an impingement upon the right of both branches relative to the delegation of legislative authority. So that if it is the purpose of the sponsors of this bill to rivet upon our body politic a permanent policy, I say no, and for that reason, in order to give this new policy a chance to work out, to see whether it shall be successful, I do indeed hope that an amendment to be offered by me, or anybody else, will prevail, to make this assuredly a temporary policy and not a permanent policy.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I may state to the gentleman that this bill is being considered under the general rules of the House, and any Member will be permitted to offer any amendment he may deem proper.

Mr. CELLER. I thank the gentleman.

Now, to implement these rights that are being given to the President, to implement the power that we are surrendering to the Executive, I shall ask the House to consider something that has been occupying the attention of a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee for some time, and that is the establishment of the right to set up in this country what is known as "foreign-trade zones." I am firmly of the conviction that along with this right to set up flexible treaties with other countries, multilateral and bilateral, we can go far forward in increasing our commerce, our exports and imports, if we give the right to seaports to set up in the various ports of entry, quasi-corporations; corporations controlled by the States or political subdivisions thereof, which corporations are to maintain and operate the so-called "foreign-trade zones."

The bill which the Ways and Means Committee is considering is H.R. 3657.

A bill to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act—

The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce;

The term "public corporation" means a State, a legal subdivision thereof, or a municipality, or a lawfully authorized public agency of a State or a municipality;

The term "applicant" means a public corporation applying for the right to establish, operate, and maintain a foreign-trade zone;

The term "grantee" means a public corporation to which the privilege of establishing, operating, and maintaining a foreign-trade zone has been granted;

The term "zone" means a "foreign-trade zone" as provided in this act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary is hereby authorized, subject to the conditions and restrictions of this act and of the rules and regulations made thereunder, upon application as hereinafter provided, to grant to public corporations the privilege of establishing, operating, and maintaining foreign-trade zones in or adjacent to ports of entry under the jurisdiction of the United States. Not more than one zone shall be authorized in or adjacent to any port of entry, except that when a port of entry is located within the confines of more than one State a zone may be authorized in each State in the territory comprised in such port of entry.

SEC. 3. Foreign and domestic merchandise of every description, except such as is prohibited by law, may, without being subject to the customs laws of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act, be brought into a zone and there stored, exhibited, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, sorted, refined, graded, cleaned, mixed with foreign or domestic merchandise or otherwise manipulated, but not manufactured, and be exported, and foreign merchandise may be sent into customs territory of the United States therefrom, in the original package or otherwise; but when foreign merchandise is so sent from a zone into customs territory of the United States it shall be subject to the laws and regulations of the United States affecting imported merchandise: Provided, That when the privilege shall be requested the collector of customs shall supervise the unloading of foreign merchandise in the zone, cause such merchandise or any portion thereof to be appraised and the duties liquidated thereon. Thereafter it may be stored or manipulated under the supervision and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and within 2 years after such unloading such merchandise, whether mixed with domestic merchandise or not, may be sent into customs territory upon the payment of such liquidated duties thereon; and if not so sent into customs territory within such period of 2 years such merchandise shall be disposed of under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and out of the proceeds the duties shall be paid and the remainder, if any, to be delivered to the owners of the property: Provided further, That subject to such regulations respecting identity and the safeguarding of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, and articles previously imported on which duty has been paid, or which have been admitted free of duty, may be taken into a zone from the customs territory of the United States, and may be brought back thereto free of duty, whether or not they have been combined with or made part, while in such zone, of other articles: Provided, That if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury their identity has not been lost such articles not entitled to free entry by reason of noncompliance with the requirements made hereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be treated when they reenter the customs territory of the United States as foreign merchandise under the provisions of the tariff laws in force at that time.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury shall assign to the zone the necessary customs officers and guards to protect the revenue and to provide for the admission of foreign merchandise into customs territory.

SEC. 5. Vessels entering or leaving a zone shall be subject to the operation of all the laws of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act, and vessels leaving a zone and arriving in customs territory of the United States shall be subject to such regulations to protect the revenue as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 6. Each application shall state in detail—

(1) The location and qualifications of the area in which it is proposed to establish a zone, showing (a) the land and water or land or water area or land area alone if the application is for its establishment in or adjacent to an interior port; (b) the means of segregation from customs territory; (c) the fitness of the area for a zone; and (d) the possibilities of expansion of the zone area;

(2) The facilities and appurtenances which it is proposed to provide and the preliminary plans and estimate of the cost thereof, and the existing facilities and appurtenances which it is proposed to utilize;

(3) The time within which the applicant proposes to commence and complete the construction of the zone and facilities and appurtenances;

(4) The methods proposed to finance the undertaking;

(5) Such other information as the Secretary may require.

The Secretary may upon his own initiative or upon request permit the amendment of the application. Any expansion of the area of an established zone shall be made and approved in the same manner as an original application.

SEC. 7. If the Secretary finds that the proposed plans and location are suitable for the accomplishment of the purpose of a foreign trade zone under this act, and that the facilities and appurtenances which it is proposed to provide are sufficient he shall make the grant. If the Secretary refuses the grant, the applicant may appeal to a board consisting of the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be rendered within 3 months from the filing of such appeal and be final as to the grant of the application.

SEC. 8. The Secretary shall prescribe such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act or the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury made hereunder and as may be necessary to carry out this act.

SEC. 9. The Secretary shall cooperate with the State, subdivision, and municipality in which the zone is located in the exercise of their police, sanitary, and other powers and in connection with the free zone. He shall also cooperate with the United States Customs Service, the Post Office Department, the Public Health Service, the Bureau of Immigration, and such other Federal agencies as have jurisdiction in ports of entry described in section 2.

SEC. 10. For the purpose of facilitating the investigations of the Secretary and his work in the granting of the privilege, in the establishment, operation, and maintenance of a zone, the President may direct the executive departments and other establishments of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary, and for such purpose each of the several departments and establishments is authorized, upon direction of the President, to furnish to the Secretary such records, papers, and information in their possession as may be required by him, and temporarily to detail to the service of the Secretary such officers, experts, or engineers as may be necessary.

SEC. 11. If the title to or right of user of any of the property to be included in a zone is in the United States, an agreement to use such property for zone purposes may be entered into between the grantee and the department or officer of the United States having control of the same, under such conditions, approved by the Secretary and such department or officer, as may be agreed upon.

SEC. 12. Each grantee shall provide and maintain in connection with the zone—

(a) Adequate slips, docks, wharves, warehouses, loading and unloading and mooring facilities where the zone is adjacent to water; or, in the case of an inland zone, adequate loading, unloading, and warehouse facilities.

(b) Adequate transportation connections with the surrounding territory and with all parts of the United States, so arranged as to permit of proper guarding and inspection for the protection of the revenue.

(c) Adequate facilities for coal or other fuel and for light and power.

(d) Adequate water and sewer mains.

(e) Adequate quarters and facilities for the officers and employees of the United States, State, and municipality whose duties may require their presence within the zone.

(f) Adequate enclosures to segregate the zone from customs territory for protection of the revenue, together with suitable provisions for ingress and egress of persons, conveyances, vessels, and merchandise.

(g) Such other facilities as may be required by the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury, acting jointly.

SEC. 13. The grantee may, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Treasury, and under reasonable and uniform regulations for like conditions and circumstances to be prescribed by them, permit private persons, firms, corporations, or associations to erect such buildings and other structures within the zone as will meet their particular requirements: Provided, That such permission shall not constitute a vested right as against the United States, nor interfere with the regulation of the grantee or the permittee by the United States, nor interfere with or complicate the revocation of the grant by the United States: And provided further, That in the event of the United States or the grantee desiring to acquire the property of the permittee no goodwill shall be considered as accruing from the privilege granted to the zone: And provided further, That such permits shall not be granted on terms that conflict with the public use of the zone as set forth in this act.

SEC. 14. Each zone shall be operated as a public utility, and all rates and charges for all services or privileges within the zone shall be fair and reasonable, and the grantee shall afford to all who may apply for the use of the zone and its facilities and appurtenances uniform treatment under like conditions, subject to such treaties or commercial conventions as are now in force or may hereafter be made from time to time by the United States with foreign governments and the cost of maintaining the additional customs service required under this act shall be paid by the operator of the zone.

Sec. 15. No person shall be allowed to reside within the zone except Federal, State, or municipal officers or agents whose resident presence is deemed necessary by the Secretary.

The Secretary shall prescribe rules and regulations regarding employees and other persons entering and leaving the zone. All rules and regulations concerning the protection of the revenue shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary may at any time order the exclusion from the zone of any goods or process of treatment that in his judgment is detrimental to the public interest, health, or safety.

No retail trade shall be conducted within the zone except under permits issued by the grantee and approved by the Secretary. Such permittees shall sell no goods except such as are brought into the zone from customs territory.

Sec. 16. The form and manner of keeping the accounts of each zone shall be prescribed by the Secretary.

Each grantee shall make to the Secretary annually, and at such other times as he may prescribe, reports containing a full statement of all the operations, receipts, and expenditures, and such other information as the Secretary may require.

The Secretary shall make a report to Congress on the first day of each regular session containing a summary of the operation and fiscal condition of each zone and transmit therewith copies of the annual report of each grantee.

Sec. 17. The grant shall not be sold, conveyed, transferred, set over, or assigned.

Sec. 18. In the event of repeated violations of any of the provisions of this act by the grantee, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury, or a majority of them, may revoke the grant after 4 months' notice to the grantee and affording it an opportunity to be heard. The testimony taken before the Secretaries shall be reduced to writing and filed in the records of the Department of Commerce, together with the decision reached thereon.

In the conduct of any proceeding under this section for the revocation of a grant the Secretaries may compel the attendance of witnesses and the giving of testimony and the production of documentary evidence, and for such purpose may invoke the aid of the district courts of the United States.

An order under the provisions of this section revoking the grant issued by the Secretaries shall be final and conclusive, unless within 90 days after its service the grantee appeals to the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which the zone is located by filing with the clerk of said court a written petition praying that the order of the Secretaries be set aside. The clerk of the court in which such a petition is filed shall immediately cause a copy thereof to be delivered to each of the Secretaries and they shall forthwith prepare, certify, and file in the court a full and accurate transcript of the record in the proceedings held before them under this section, the charges, the evidence, and the order revoking the grant. The testimony and evidence taken or submitted before the Secretaries, duly certified and filed as a part of the record, shall be considered by the court as the evidence in the case.

On such appeal the court shall review the record of proceedings before the Secretaries and, if a decision of said Secretaries shall be supported by evidence, shall only make decision on errors of law.

Sec. 19. In case of a violation of this act, or any regulation of the Secretary under this act, by the grantee, any officer, agent, or employee thereof responsible for or permitting any such violation shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000. Each day during which a violation continues shall constitute a separate offense.

Sec. 20. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to certain circumstances be held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provisions to circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

Sec. 21. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

There recently appeared in the New York Times a communication to the effect that the Maritime Association of the Port of New York was opposed to the establishment of free-trade zones in the United States as provided for in my bill, H.R. 3657. I wrote to the editor of the New York Times the following communication, which embodies my views in support of this bill.

MARCH 19, 1934.

CITY EDITOR (MARITIME SECTION) NEW YORK TIMES,

New York, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I note the report published in this morning's Times of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, in opposition to the establishment of foreign-trade zones in the United States as provided for in my bill, H.R. 9206.

It is mighty strange that this association voices opposition in the face of most favorable commendation of this bill by such organizations as the Port of New York Authority, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the Merchants' Association of the State of New York, the Maritime Association of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, the Baltimore Association of Commerce, the Export and Import Bureau of Baltimore, the New Orleans Association of Commerce, the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, the Chicago Association of Commerce, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the Pacific American Steamship Association, and the Ship Owners' Association of the Pacific Coast, the trade associations of Hampton Roads and Norfolk, the Chamber of Commerce of Jersey City, the Tariff Commission of the United States, and the United States Department of Commerce.

A free port or free zone is defined as "a place limited in extent but differs from adjacent territory in being exempt from customs laws as affecting goods destined for reexport." It means simply that, as regards duties, there is freedom unless and until imported goods enter the domestic market. A free zone may be defined as an isolated, enclosed, and policed area in or adjacent to a port of entry, without resident population, furnished with the necessary facilities for lading and unloading, for supplying fuel and ship stores, for storing goods, and for reshipping them by land and water—an area within which goods may be landed, stored, mixed, blended, repacked, manufactured, and reshipped without payment of duties and without the intervention of customs officials. * * *

The purpose of the free zone is to encourage and expedite that part of a nation's foreign trade which its government wishes to free from the restrictions instituted by customs duties. In other words, it aims to foster the dealing in foreign goods that are imported, not for domestic consumption but for reexport to foreign markets and for the conditioning or for combining with domestic products previous to export.

Henry Chalmers, Chief, Division of Foreign Tariffs, Department of Commerce, testified that the establishment of foreign-trade zones would greatly increase our foreign trade and that the Department of Commerce "has long been impressed with the fact that compared with the other major commercial nations the re-export and transshipment trade of the United States is remarkably small in volume", and that foreign-trade zones "should not only aid in the extension of the reexport and transshipment trade of the United States but should make possible that fuller and more effective utilization of our merchant marine."

The principle of establishing facilities for storing, manipulating, smelting, foreign products in bond for reshipment and of providing for drawback or return of duty paid on materials used in the manufacture for reexport have been recognized in the Tariff Act of 1930 in sections 555, 557, etc. The extension of this principle by providing for specific zones in which these functions could be carried on without interference involves adoption of no new principle. It would simply do away with the present disadvantages of using the warehouse and drawback system and concentrate these operations in a specific area to the advantage both of the ship, merchant, and customs supervision. For example, instead of 80 separate bonded warehouses scattered all around the port of New York and requiring 1,400 bonded truckmen and lighters to move products back and forth between these warehouses and piers the entire operation could be concentrated within a customs stockade easily policed by the customs officials. In Stockholm, for example, the free port, which covers about 5,500,000 square feet of area, is controlled by 20 customs guards.

Such foreign trade zones, or free ports, are a regular feature in European and Asiatic ports, there being 41 such zones in various parts of the world. In Hamburg, Germany, nine tenths of the dockage for sea-going vessels lies within the confines of the free port and the tonnage handled in the free port of Hamburg has amounted to, in recent years, as much as 22,000,000 tons of cargo per annum. By reason of its facilities for handling transshipment cargo cheaply and expeditiously, the free port of Hamburg has become the center of a world trade in rice, jute, crude rubber, cocoa beans, hides, skins, etc. The directors of the port of Hamburg point out that the adoption of the free-port principle has enabled Hamburg to greatly accelerate the dispatch of vessels, and the United States Shipping Board estimates that adoption of a similar principle in the United States might save time and cost to shipowners equal to $1,000 a trip for freighters and perhaps as high as $5,000 per day for higher-type vessels.

Take, for example, the drawbacks which are supposed to be an encouragement to the importation of foreign products, to be fabricated and manipulated in this country, and then to be reshipped, as a result of which 99 percent of the duty is refunded. This is to be an encouragement to American manufacturing. However, the privilege of drawbacks is so hedged about with restrictions and hindrances, as to practically become negligible in American commerce.

Herewith are given the amount of customs drawbacks paid by the United States since 1922:

Amount of customs drawbacks paid by United States since 1922

1922	$35,290,000.00
1923	11,934,000.00
1924	14,095,000.00
1925	20,658,000.00
1926	13,136,000.00
1927	13,560,046.08
1928	13,194,682.45
1929	14,925,888.43
1930	12,577,970.51
1931	12,162,475.46
1932	8,418,434.14
1933	7,154,527.56

It will be noted that there has been a falling off from $35,000,000 to $7,000,000. The falling off has been greater proportionately than the shrinkage in general trade due to the depression. The paltry figure of $7,000,000 clearly indicates that the drawback system has become useless. A foreign-trade zone would remedy greatly this situation. The same restrictions now present in connection with the drawback system are present with equal force and degree in connection with bonded warehousing.

It may very well be that the members of the committee of the Maritime Association who opposed this bill might have their own particular interests seriously affected by its adoption. That naturally would prejudice them against the bill. Certain shipping and towing interests are naturally opposed to its passage. It would derange their affairs. An intelligent self-interest prompts them to oppose it. I have no objection to that opposition; they should, however, indicate their interest.

It must be understood, also, that New York is not the only city involved in the bill. It is an enabling act that would permit any port to set up a foreign-trade zone anywhere along our seacoast.

Yours very truly,

EMANUEL CELLER.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

I have had prepared a series of questions and answers concerning foreign-trade zones, and herewith set them forth:

Functions and benefits of foreign-trade zones

The establishment of foreign-trade zones in the United States can be secured only if Congress enacts the necessary enabling legislation. The following fundamental statements are presented in order that the functions and benefits which foreign-trade zones will provide may be thoroughly understood and legislative action secured.

What is a foreign-trade zone?

A foreign-trade zone is an area within a port of entry carefully segregated from customs territory and free from all customs tariffs and regulations.

What can be done in a foreign-trade zone?

Foreign merchandise can be unloaded, stored, exhibited, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, sorted, refined, graded, cleaned, mixed with foreign or domestic merchandise, or otherwise manipulated, and shipped either to foreign countries or into the United States.

What advantages of a foreign-trade zone are not available under the present bonded warehouse or drawback system?

The principal advantage is the elimination of all customs formalities necessary under the present system of bonded warehouses and drawbacks by avoiding delays, trouble, and expense connected with making entry, paying duty and premium for bonds, cartage, expenses for customs supervision of operations, securing withdrawal permits, etc. Domestic products may be combined with imported goods. Merchandise may be exhibited. Foreign-trade zones invite and simplify such operations, while the present system necessarily makes them difficult.

Does the establishment of foreign-trade zones affect the tariff policy of a country or its complete enforcement?

No. The operation of foreign-trade zones has no bearing whatever upon policies of protection or free trade, because, so far as our tariff laws are concerned, these zones are outside the country, and merchandise entering the country from a foreign-trade zone must, as if directly received from abroad, comply with all requirements of the tariff law.

Can foreign-trade zones operate without imperiling the protection or revenues of a country; that is, can smuggling be prevented?

Many years' experience of foreign-trade zones abroad prove that with proper operating agencies and adequate barriers and guards, smuggling does not occur.

What governmental supervision is customary and necessary in the operation of foreign-trade zones?

All operations in a foreign-trade zone are strictly supervised by Federal customs and tariff officials, under stringent rules and regulations to insure proper conduct. This supervision is based on reports of operations within the zone, ships' manifests, the entry and withdrawal of merchandise from the zone, etc.

Who would use foreign-trade zones?

American importers, exporters, and manufacturers, as well as foreign merchants.

What benefits would result from the operation of foreign-trade zones and who would benefit thereby?

Importers, exporters, wholesalers, jobbers, manufacturers, rail and ocean carriers would benefit by an increased volume of business. Importers could exhibit foreign goods, store merchandise until sold in the United States of America or abroad, mix with domestic products or recondition, sort or repack before shipping abroad. Exporters would avoid payment of duties and expenses on imported goods to be reexported. Domestic manufacturers using foreign materials would always have stocks of such materials available, could buy in larger quantities ordinarily at a lower price, and store their products in the zone until sold in either domestic or foreign trade. Steamship lines would benefit by increased traffic, thereby aiding our American merchant marine. Labor would benefit by increased employment due to new manufacturing and a larger volume of goods to be unloaded, handled, repacked, reshipped, etc.

Are foreign-trade zones operated by government or by private individuals under government supervision?

Foreign-trade zones may be operated either by private or public corporations; that is, divisions of government.

Where would foreign-trade zones be located?

In any port of entry, either seaboard or inland, provided the applicant is trustworthy and willing to comply with all governmental requirements of the Secretaries of Commerce and the Treasury.

Would the establishment of foreign-trade zones aid in recovery from the depression and thereby form an important part in the foreign-trade recovery program?

American business realizes the dependence of prosperity and the reemployment of labor on the maintenance and extension of America's foreign trade, including both import and export. The facilities of foreign-trade zones would, therefore, by encouraging and simplifying foreign-trade operations, serve to aid the recovery program advocated by Government officials.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FOULKES].

THE MENACE OF HITLERISM IN AMERICA

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives has very properly authorized an investigation of the intrigues and propaganda of agents of the insane despot of Germany, Adolf Hitler, in this country.

But on the heels of its decision to conduct this investigation, the House has heard the treacherous siren song of Hitlerism as it speaks through Dr. William Wirt, of Gary, Ind., and is even now considering the resolution of Representative BULWINKLE calling for a congressional investigation of Dr. Wirt's charges that there is a fearful Red conspiracy being hatched somewhere in the departments of the Government by the men who are devoting their talents and energies to the task of trying to assure the American people enough to eat.

I am very glad that the House voted to authorize the probe of Hitlerism and the nefarious doings of Nazi spies within the borders of the United States.

However, I wish to point out that the committee now supervising this investigation of the Nazi conspiracy on American soil must by no means fail to take cognizance of the activities of Dr. Wirt.

Dr. Wirt's statements on their very face are preposterous enough and false enough to arouse the condemnation of all who welcome political policies that tend to eliminate poverty. Any clear-thinking and fair-minded citizen can see for himself how unjust are these attacks on the administration for its efforts to get rid of unemployment and to put an end to destitution. Under ordinary circumstances such attacks could be considered cheap and contemptible playing of politics by men who ought to be ashamed of themselves for descending to such levels of chicanery.

But, in my humble judgment, this is something more than the low mud-slinging and lying of petty political schemers. I am convinced that it is part of a vicious plot—a plot in which the plotters are Hitler agents in this country, hoping to discredit the social welfare and humanitarian policies of the Roosevelt administration and anticipating that they may be able to set up a Nazi or Fascist dictatorship in which a representative of Wall Street will have absolute control.

I believe it is also a plot in which the profiteers and grafters of the United States are readily and eagerly cooperating with Hitler tools, since these profiteers and grafters view with hostility every progressive and forward-looking step of the Government and want to hinder and handicap the administration in every conceivable way.

The hideous Nazi philosophy is built upon a bloody dictatorship by a single despot who represents the ruling class—the millionaires and the billionaires—and aided by the stimulation of savage racial and religious prejudices that never ought to exist. It is a philosophy that is now being looked upon with favor by the members of the plutocracy, since they realize that their doom is near at hand unless they can succeed in installing a Nazi dictatorship in which some representative of their caste will hold the reins of government. Seeing their power slipping from them, the kings and kaisers of Wall Street look upon Hitlerism as a way out of the dilemma—a path that will lead them back to their disappearing dominance. Therefore they are ready to throw overboard the forms of democracy and democratic government as no longer of service to them and to grab at nazi-ism as the salvation of their class.

Mr. Chairman, it is no coincidence that this cleverly timed and cunningly arranged assault should now be made upon the so-called "brain trust" by this head of the school system in Gary, Ind.—a city named after one of the greatest exploiters of human labor in modern times—and splashed across the front pages of every reactionary newspaper in the United States. Such things do not just happen. It is no accident that propagandists, organizers, and informers for the Nazi movement are swarming all over this country, planting agents in schools and colleges, organizing secret societies whose ideal is an absolute monarchy under which the poor have even less freedom than they had under the czarism of Hoover, Coolidge, and Harding, and trying to thwart the very moderate reforms initiated since Inauguration Day, 1933.

These developments are no coincidence and no accident. They come because of certain causes that are easy to discover.

Big business in America is angry at the mild progressivism that has so far characterized the Roosevelt administration. It hates any kind of progressivism—even the mildest.

Nazi-ism is training a secret army of conspirators to seize governmental control at the right opportunity and set up a dictatorship, not of "Reds" or of sons of toil who happen to be Communists or Socialists and, therefore, a little ahead of the rest of the people in their social ideals, but a dictatorship in which an American Hitler would wield the ax of power over the heads of any who sought to organize the poor and the unfortunate.

The yarns about a Communist menace are the most sickening blather. They are too false, too silly, to merit attention. There is no menace from Communists or Socialists or any others who sacrifice their own comfort for an ideal commonwealth and who, in their devotion to a principle, deny themselves life's ordinary comforts.

The real menace is that of the well-schooled, carefully trained, thoroughly disciplined, and docile followers of Herr Hitler, who infest this country and have spread the poison that we are drifting into dangerous revolutionary directions and that a Nazi imperialism is the only recourse if we want to avoid bolshevism.

These men are a menace. I sincerely trust that the committee headed by Representative DICKSTEIN will completely expose their abominable and evil machinations.

I hope also that the pitiless light of publicity is thrown upon this man, Dr. William Wirt, of Gary, Ind., who at this significant moment, when Nazi conspirators overrun our country, gives them aid and comfort by asinine allegations about a Red conspiracy to lure Mr. Roosevelt and his associates into unsafe procedure.

We want none of Dr. Wirt's bunk. The American people will have no time and no patience for him. They will not be impressed by a Red scare directed at the only administration in more than a decade that has given honest concern to the needs of human beings.

If Dr. Wirt is not an agent of Hitlerism in America, he is unconsciously serving it as well as any paid tool could serve it. If he is not seeking to aid those who would set up a terrorism of nazi-ism or fascism tomorrow, he is certainly handsomely playing into their hands. He is either a faithful servant of the sinister forces of predatory wealth or a consummate ass.

America is not afraid of champions of the poor and lowly—call them Red or what you may. What it should be fearful of, and what it should strike down with swift and sturdy hand, are these evil instruments of Herr Hitler and the stupid fools who in their ignorance become blind allies.

Instead of this notoriety-seeking school teacher—whose former occupation was, I understand, that of a banker, utterly out of sympathy with those who earn their bread and butter by sweat and honest toil—exposing a weird and mysterious Red plot, he has come dangerously near exposing the fantastic notions of somebody's hangover after a long and protracted cocktail party.

The trouble with Dr. Wirt seems to be a brainstorm, I am told, that followed the drunken debauch of his maudlin informants. In an orgy in which certain people seem to have consumed "strange drinks and had strange thinks", and in which their brains deserted them, they conceived the nightmare that the "brain trust" was engaged in communistic deviltry.

If those who told Dr. Wirt these yarns had kept sober, and if he had been less gullible, all of this excitement would never have occurred. That is, assuming that he is honestly deceived, for I prefer to think that he has been bamboozled instead of believing that he is deliberately in the employ of Hitler.

But regardless of the cause of this extravagant spreading of bombastic absurdity by Wirt, let the Congress refuse to be swept off its feet by another one of the disgusting attempts to create Red hysteria, and let it continue bravely at its task of waging war against hunger, against suffering, against legalized robbery, and against the dictatorship of Wall Street. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the gentleman from North Carolina has 3 hours and 5 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Massachusetts has 3 hours and 26 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill, H.R. 8687, the Tariff Act, 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

LIQUOR CONTROL ACT—TERRITORY OF ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 11, which resolution asks that the President return to the Senate the bill S. 2729.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 11

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President is requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2729, 73d Cong., 2d sess.) to repeal an act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes", approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object; as I understand, this is to make a correction in a bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Alaska spoke to me about it. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate concurrent resolution.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LOANS TO SAVE RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS FROM EXTINCTION

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, many churches and other religious institutions are now threatened with extinction because they are temporarily unable, in this period of unprecedented depression, to meet their mortgage obligations. In these times, when our spiritual resources need so much to be strengthened to reestablish the mutual respect and ways of right living that are essential to enduring National welfare and happiness, the obliteration of one church would be a calamity to the community where it is located and the obliteration of thousands of churches scattered over the country, would be a major national disaster.

Under leave to print I present herewith a statement I made the other day to the Banking and Currency Subcommittee of the House in support of my bill (H.R. 8638) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans on easy terms to aid in refinancing the building indebtedness of churches and other institutions for religious instruction and worship. The address follows:

I assume that those who champion this legislation to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to come to the aid of churches and other religious organizations that are threatened with property foreclosures either consciously or subconsciously predicate their action on one particular theory that differentiates this proposal from all other proposals that ever came before Congress having reference to Government loans.

That theory, the magnet which attracts support to this bill, recognizes that churches and other religious institutions are basic in human welfare and that anything that may be done through a proper and safeguarded use of the Government's credit to prevent them from being wiped out of existence and to enable them to function normally will inevitably contribute to the well-being of society.

It was that purpose which motivated me when on June 7, 1933, I introduced a bill, H.R. 5961—the first one ever introduced on this subject—permitting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans at 4 percent for 5-year periods, with privileges of extension, and without amortization of the principal being required. The legislation seemed to Senator Capper to be meritorious and he introduced a companion bill in the Senate.

Any tribute I might attempt at this time to pay to Christianity would be flickering and feeble as compared with the merit that surrounds that most blessed influence in the world. I believe that most of the woes in which the world finds itself steeped today can be traced directly or indirectly to neglect, sometimes verging into open defiance, of the tenets of Christianity. We have wandered far from the straight road that leads to salvation and I use that word not only in its social and spiritual sense, but I mean economic salvation as well.

If the world had held true to Christianity the greatest of all wars would never have occurred and we would have been spared the mountainous debts and the repercussions manifest by the worst depression in all history and we would not now be framing our national budgets on the basis that out of every dollar wrung from the taxpayers to pay the cost of the regular governmental establishment 72 cents must go to defray the expenses of wars past and the preparation for wars to come.

I think it is axiomatic that in America religious training and worship lie at the very foundation of national welfare. That principle is recognized on our coins which carry the legend "In God we trust." I think it also is demonstrable that many of our troubles and ills of the present day are traceable to the fact that we as a Nation have strayed so far from the path of true religion. I sincerely believe, therefore, that the bill I have introduced is vested with a quality that brings it within the scope of legislation for the public welfare.

In this black night of the worst depression the world has ever known many churches throughout America are threatened with obliteration because they cannot meet their payments; many religious schools and other institutions likewise are facing extinction.

CHALLENGE TO OUR HIGHEST IDEALISM

The question is, What can we do to save them? Is not their plight a challenge to our highest idealism and our best efforts? To show that the picture of their condition which I am presenting is not fanciful or overdrawn, let me read extracts from a few of the many letters I have received. Carlos M. Dinsmore, secretary of edifice funds of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, writes:

I would say that there are at least 50 of our (Northern Baptist) churches in a serious situation because of their debt and it would take a loan of about $2,000,000 to take care of these cases. In nearly every church the debt could be settled on the basis of 50 cents on the dollar if the church could get the money soon. In a good many of these cases the banks have voluntarily offered to make a very large reduction if a settlement could be made.

Rev. Julian E. Stuart, pastor of the Wyatt Park Christian Church of St. Joseph, Mo., writes:

It is my conviction that the future happiness and very stability of our great American people depends to a large extent upon the life of the churches of the land. Caught in the devastating sweep of the depression, many of our most useful institutions are facing a most desperate struggle for continued life and service. Your bill, if passed, and I trust that it will be, will bring a new hope to the church.

The Extension Magazine, official organ of the Catholic Home Missions, 300,000 circulation, says editorially:

Here is the opportunity of the century for all church-going people to unite on at least one measure of cooperation in order to save thousands of houses of God erected by the people as testimonies of their trust in God. The Senators and Representatives of the people of the United States of America have it in their power through the passage of the Ludlow-Capper bill to strengthen our trust in God, and our hope that while the material prosperity of our country is our present goal, the spiritual values in which millions of our people put much hope will not be forgotten. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is spending billions in rehabilitating banks, insurance companies, corporations of all kinds, farmers and home owners, to weather the financial hurricane, while thousands of churches and religious organizations throughout the country are being financially strangled by the heavy mortgages which the banks and insurance companies are demanding that they pay to the last penny.

John H. Booth, secretary of the board of church extension of the Disciples of Christ, writes:

Thousands of fine churches throughout the country—most of them the finest churches in their communities—will not be able to survive without Federal loans to help them to carry their property indebtedness.

TESTIMONY OF THE CLERGY

Monsignor Marino Priori, of Indianapolis, an outstanding churchman and founder and editor of Eternal Light, a notable publication of the church, says:

The bill introduced by Representative LOUIS LUDLOW to enable the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan to churches and religious institutions is worthy of the immediate consideration of the United States Congress now in session. The chaos of the depression has worked a great hardship on the churches, especially in regard to their indebtedness. The aim and purpose of this legislation will be to the benefit of the whole country.

That this bill has made a wide appeal and that it is supported by almost a unanimous favorable opinion in religious circles is indicated by a letter dated March 16, 1934, from Mr. J. Paul Maynard, advertising manager of the Christian Herald, in which he says:

A few weeks ago I wrote to a large group of ministers, spread over the country and well over the various large Protestant denominations. To date we have received 183 returned questionnaires. Of these 183, 175 indicated that they would like to avail themselves of the opportunity presented by your bill. Eight raised the question of the undesirability of involving church with the state. Of these eight, one said even though he was doubtful about its advisability, he would avail himself of such an opportunity. The importance of this analysis lies in the fact that it represents the unprejudiced opinion of Protestant clergymen throughout the country.

Since introducing the original bill last year I have made one change in it, and the bill as reintroduced in its revised form on March 14, 1934, is known as H.R. 8638. The original bill authorized the Government "to aid in financing the operation and maintenance of institutions for religious instruction and worship." It seemed on mature reflection that this did not clearly express the purpose the friends of the bill had in mind. The entire purpose of the bill is to relieve distress by saving churches and other religious organizations from threatened property foreclosure, and it could hardly be said that financing for operation and maintenance would be relieving distress within the intended meaning. So in the revised bill, which simply carries out the original intention, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized "to aid in refinancing the building indebtedness of churches and other institutions for religious instruction and worship."

This narrowing of the language, it is believed, will facilitate the passage of the measure. Many persons and church groups that have written to me have urged that the language of the bill be broadened so as to authorize Government financing of new church construction, but I do not believe that such broadening of the scope of the bill would be justifiable or that Congress could be induced to approve it. This is a bill to relieve institutions now in distress and not to build new institutions.

At present a church or religious society cannot make a loan directly from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, no matter how valuable the property may be that it has to offer as security. A loan can only be made, if at all, through the agency of a bank or mortgage loan company, and then at a rate of interest in excess of 5 percent. The bank, if it borrows from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has to pay the Corporation 5-percent interest and it depends on making its profit by reloaning to the church at a rate in excess of 5 percent.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY TO POSTERITY

The bill I have introduced would enable the church or religious organization to borrow on the strength of its property assets directly from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a period of 5 years and at 4-percent interest. It would not be necessary for the church to act through a bank or mortgage loan company as intermediary. I have fixed the rate of interest at 4 percent as the Government can borrow money around 3½ percent and the extra one half of 1 percent would cover the Government's overhead cost of handling these transactions. What it would amount to, therefore, would be that the Government would lend its credit to the churches by permitting part of the funds appropriated to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be borrowed on approved church security to help the church and religious organizations in this time of great emergency, which amounts to a crisis in the history of many churches.

This assistance would be rendered without any cost to the Government. In the past I have been somewhat dubious about the policy of the Government making loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but since we have embarked on that program I think there is every reason in good policy why the principle should be broadened to include loans to churches and religious organizations on adequately secured property.

America has grown great under the necessary guidance of religion, and without the efforts of the religious missionaries this country would be as another Russia. For these reasons I believe this bill is a worthy one, and I hope it will receive general approval and support.

When we take up this bill to decide its fate, let us not forget that we are the guardians of posterity. We hold in our encircling arms the children of countless generations yet unborn. By passing this bill let us make the world a better place for them to live. Let us by favorable action on this bill show that our vaunted phrase "In God we trust" is not a mere lip expression. Let us pass this bill and strengthen our moral and religious reserves; and by so doing, fortify America for the momentous years that are to come.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY TO POSTERITY

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CADY, for 4 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. EAGLE (at the request of Mr. BLANTON), on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. ELLENBOGEN, for 3 days, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 19 minutes p.m.), the House, pursuant to its order previously entered, adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 28, 1934, at 11 o'clock a.m.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

(Wednesday, Mar. 28, 10 a.m.)

A hearing will be conducted on H.R. 8758.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

(Wednesday, Mar. 28, 10 a.m.)

Continuation of the hearings on railroad bills.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1934

The Chaplain, Rev. Z. Barney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Savior, who for our sakes hast worn the robe of mortal flesh, thereby revealing unto us the Father's love in ways that pass man's understanding; grant that as we follow in reverent contemplation the sacred story of this holy week we may find light in the sunshine of Thy sorrow, shelter in the shadow of Thy cross.

Be patient with our broken purposes of good, with every faint endeavor, and give to us the joy that comes only to those who strive, through failure and through loss, to build Thy kingdom into the hearts of men.

Christ, though our hands be bleeding,
Fierce though our flesh be pleading,
Still let us see Thee leading,
Let us build on.
Till through death's cruel dealing,
Brain wrecked and reason reeling,
We hear love's trumpet pealing,
And we pass on.

Amen.

PETER NORBECK, a Senator from the State of South Dakota, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day of Tuesday, March 27, when, on motion by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Hattigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had concurred in Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 11, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). THE END OF A LONG, LONG TRAIL—ARTICLE BY VERA CONNOLLY

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD an article appearing in the April 1934 issue of the Good Housekeeping Magazine, entitled "The End of a Long, Long Trail", by Vera Connolly.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE END OF A LONG, LONG TRAIL

By Vera Connolly

Lone Buffalo and Mrs. Lone Buffalo and their 4 boys and 3 girls were happy on their land. It was a wide land. A river and many streams flowed through it. There were deep forests with deer and lynx and beavers. Mountains sheltered it from the north and west gales which sweep the Rocky Mountain Plateau.

Lone Buffalo and his family occupied this wide land in common with 1,500 other members of their tribe. The tribe owned great herds of cattle. They cultivated the fields and supplied nearly all of their own wants. They were gentle, peaceful, and self-supporting.

Then one day 20 years ago there came a band of men from Washington. These men were called land-allotting agents. And they said to Lone Buffalo:

"You are going to be civilized.

"It is not civilized to hold your land as a common property. And it is against the law of the Government for Indians.

"You, Lone Buffalo, are to become the sole owner of 80 acres of this land.

"Your wife is to become sole owner of another 80 acres.

"Each of your children is to be sole owner of 80 acres.

"Each Indian here will be sole owner of 80 acres. No Indian shall have anything to do with the land of any other Indian.

"When your day on earth is finished, Lone Buffalo, the Government will sell your 80 acres to a white man. It will sell your wife's 80 acres when she dies.

"Half of all the land of your people will be sold immediately to white buyers."

Lone Buffalo said: "This will be the ruin of my people. It will destroy my family. We cannot live without our land."

But the allotting agent replied, "It is the law."

That was 20 years ago.

Now Lone Buffalo is dead. His land has been sold to a white man. Mrs. Lone Buffalo is dead. A white man has her land. Five of the seven children have died. Their land has been sold to whites. The two remaining children have rented their 80 acres to a white sheep grazer, and the sheep, too numerous for the area, have destroyed the grass, and the soil is nearly all washed away. There were thousands of Indian-owned cattle. Now there are no cattle owned by Indians. And of Lone Buffalo's fellow tribesmen there are now thirteen hundred with no land. Two hundred still possess small bodies of land, widely separated by white-owned ranges. All of the tribe has become dependent on the Government for support. The happiness of old days is a memory. Bitterness and despair have taken its place.

Lone Buffalo is one of 200,000 Indians ruined by the monstrous allotment system—a system designed, as Indian Commissioner Collier stated to me recently, "To rob Indians under form of law, and to kill their souls while it robs them."

And today the system is unchanged. The Indians are doomed unless it is changed. A supreme effort to change it has now been launched. Congress is the arbiter. Will you women of the United States help?

"Help us! Help us, white women of America! As you helped us before!" Once again the American Indians are crying out to you, readers of Good Housekeeping. Once again they desperately need your help.

Five years ago, through the pages of this magazine, they sent up a cry of agony to you: "Help us! We starve. We shiver in rags. We drop with disease. We are being robbed by our Federal guardians of all we have left. Help us! Save us!" Such was their cry.

You listened. Your hearts were wrung. You—white women—arose in a body. You demanded an overturning of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in Washington. You demanded a new day for the Indian people. By the thousands you wrote to your representatives in Congress and demanded that they act.

This great tidal wave of righteous anger—woman anger—performed a miracle. It gave the needed onward rush to the slowly mounting sea of public dissatisfaction with the conduct of Indian affairs. Massing itself solidly behind John Collier, who had just completed a 10-year furious battle for Indian rights; massing itself behind the shocking revelations in the Institute for Government Research report; massing itself behind the investigations conducted by the Red Cross, the American Indian Defense Association, the Indian Rights Association, the National Council of American Indians, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and Good Housekeeping; massing itself grimly behind the sickening facts being revealed by the Senate investigating committee—this great tidal wave of woman indignation helped sweep the movement for reform of Indian affairs to victory.

Charles H. Burke, then Indian Commissioner, on whose administration the Good Housekeeping expose had focused its principal attack, resigned. He was succeeded by Charles J. Rhoads, of Philadelphia. Mr. Rhoads, a humanitarian, did much to build up the personnel and the spirit of service in the Indian Bureau.

But the body of laws which he inherited from Commissioner Burke remained unchanged. The vicious land-allotment system remained. The system of arbitrary management was still in force. The basic conditions which had wrought to cumulative havoc upon Indian life and land remained unaltered—because the framework of law remained unaltered.

This is true today. The fundamental evils of the Government's Indian system still remain—because the framework of wrongful laws has not been put right. Let us look now to the present.

For 1 year there has been in office, as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the grim, dynamic fighter who was Good Housekeeping's candidate for Commissioner 5 years ago—as well as the choice of many Indian welfare groups. This is John Collier, the Indians' valiant champion for over 15 years. To this battling, indomitable crusader, more than to any other individual or group, is due the reform of Indian affairs now under way. It is suitable that he, the Indians' friend and defender, should today be the chief executive at the head of the bureau that manages their affairs. For 15 years he has lived among them, loved them, studied their problems and sorrows, and fought for justice for them.

In the 1 year he has been their Commissioner he has made an enviable record. He has launched broad and fine projects. He has checked waste by abolishing more than 600 jobs held by whites. He has made a spectacular success of the Indian conservation camps. He has initiated a speedy, radical shift from boarding to day schools, and is sponsoring a wholly new type of day school. He has laid the foundations for a complete reorganization, when changed laws permit, of Indian forestry management. He has brought the Pueblo problems to a solution. He has encouraged Indians to train for employment in the Indian Service. He has placed competent Indians in high positions as, for instance, Wade Crawford, who has been made superintendent of the Klamath Reservation.

All that an executive of vision could do, under the handicaps of ancient, iniquitous laws and a limited budget, Commissioner Collier has done in the 1 short year he has been in office. Yet he is far from satisfied. To him, as to all friends of the Indians, these efforts are temporary structures built on sand. As a foundation for permanent reform, a wholly new system of Indian law must be procured.

You, readers of Good Housekeeping, you who, 5 years ago, helped to usher in a new day for the Indians, will have to hurl yourselves once more into the battle for Indian rights. You will have to mass yourselves behind Commissioner Collier and his new, daring program of legislation which is now before Congress. On the fate of this proposed legislation will hang in large measure the fate of the Indian people. The present moment is a crisis of desperate importance for them. Their very survival is at stake.

This new, tragically needed legislation was not framed by Commissioner Collier alone. It was the result of joint action taken during a conference in Washington on January 7 of all leaders and groups in the field of Indian welfare. These included the Indian Rights Association, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the American Indian Defense Association, the National Council of American Indians, the Indian Committee of the American Civil Liberties Union, and the National Association on Indian Affairs. And among the notable individuals participating were Mrs. Harold L. Ickes, wife of the Secretary of the Interior; Mr. J. Henry Scattergood; Dr. Moses Saenz, of Mexico City, Mexico; Dr. E. A. Bates, of Cornell University; and, as chairman of the conference, Dr. Lewis Meriam, of the Institute for Government Research—the Dr. Meriam whose report on the tragic condition of our Indians, 5 years ago, shocked the civilized world. This is the first time in history, as the Washington Post pointed out, that all associations dealing with Indian interests have been agreed upon a policy.

What is this policy? What is Commissioner Collier—what are the welfare groups—battling to obtain for the Indians?

First of all, land! The preservation of what land they still have and the obtaining of more land. Landless Indians are pauperized Indians—poor, idle, despairing, diseased; a pitiful, unbearable burden on an impatient white civilization into which they do not fit. It is estimated today that our landless Indians number 100,000, while another 100,000 are at the verge of landlessness.

In 1887 there was passed what was known as the Allotment Act. This provided for the allotment of a certain tract varying in size from 10 to 160 acres to each member of a tribe for 25 years, at the end of which time the Secretary of the Interior could issue a patent in fee to the Indian, declare him "competent", and wash his hands of him. After one of these tracts had been allotted to each individual Indian of a reservation all surplus reservation lands were then opened for homesteading or sale to whites.

Allotment has forced our American Indians to become a progressively landless people. On receiving his patent in fee (deed), the average Indian would sell his allotment for ready cash, his tract being too small, unless it chanced to be farming land, to support his family. When he died, the Government sold his lands to whites. By this process in 50 years the Indians have lost 86,000,000 acres of their finest land. That is, Indian-owned lands have shrunk from 133,000,000 acres in 1887 to 47,000,000 acres today, about 20,000,000 of which are desert land.

One of the first stern edicts Commissioner Collier issued on taking office was that the sale of allotted lands to whites must be halted. But this administrative order, to become permanent, must be made a law. And this step was the first resolution agreed upon by the united welfare groups, which met on January 7 to discuss needed legislation. Without one dissenting voice the conference voted:

"That the provisions of the Allotment Law of 1887 which require or permit the transfer of Indian tribal lands to individual Indians and the sale of such lands by individual Indians to non-Indians should be immediately repealed."

And the conference approved also the following closely related proposals:

"1. That Indian lands now held in trust be consolidated into usable units and be controlled by the Indian community.

"2. That, so far as feasible, allotted lands, especially grazing and forest lands, be restored to community ownership. That additional lands be acquired. That the alienation of capital assets of the tribes be guarded against. That a system of Indian credit for land and industrial development be devised.

"3. That the present land inheritance and distribution laws which tend to split Indian lands up into small, useless tracts be modified. That community ownership and control be vigorously promoted instead." (The italics are the author's.)

Save the Indians' land! Help them to operate it en bloc. Procure land for the landless ones. This is the land measure which Congress must pass.

Tied up with it, an integral part of it indeed, is the next legislative item, which provides for extending, as rapidly as possible, the right of Indian groups to organize and govern themselves. This would permit the incorporation of Indian tribes. It would encourage the organization of legally recognized tribal councils. It would repeal the old "espionage" and "gag" acts, and enact an Indian bill of rights. It would establish a system of law and order on the reservations in accordance with recognized principles of fair play and the due process of law.

As regards Indian self-government, the emphatic conclusion reached by the welfare conferees on January 7 was: "The powers of government now exercised over the Indians through the office of Indian affairs should be gradually transferred to the Indian community, with only such restrictions as shall be needed to assure the continuance of health, educational, and welfare services maintained by the Government."

A startling proposal! But if the Indian communities are ever to be built up, the constantly growing Indian Service with its bureaucratic control must be arrested—in fact, progressively reduced. Commissioner Collier not only approves, but is one of the insistent advocates of this. Thus he goes on record as being the first Indian Commissioner ever to urge on Congress the diminution of his own power and authority. With this magnificent spirit at the head of the Indian Bureau, nothing except public indifference, public apathy, can prevent the sun of Indian hope and opportunity from rising rapidly above the gray mists of past affliction and despair.

First, however, there is a battle to be fought. Get into the fight, readers of Good Housekeeping. The Indians bitterly need you. Powerful forces of greed and corruption, of special privilege, of State selfishness as opposed to broad national welfare, are certain to throw themselves into opposition to much of this proposed legislation.

The States may be expected, for instance, to beam approval at the clause in this bill urging passage of the principles embodied in the old Swing-Johnson bill. This would permit, but not compel, participation of the States in the administration of health, social welfare, and other special services. Federal money, flowing into State coffers, would be welcomed, no doubt.

But what of the clause in the bill which would restore the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma and their rapidly disappearing property to Federal guardianship once more, placing them on a parity with protected Indians elsewhere? Can all elements and forces in the State of Oklahoma be expected to welcome that? A single Oklahoma tribe, the Osages, have surrendered lands and trusts valued at $220,000,000 to whites since 1915 under the exploiting special laws for Oklahoma Indians, which did not prevent the white man from plundering their trust funds derived from oil fields.

What of certain other beneficent clauses, such as the one that would give preference to qualified Indians as employees in their own Indian Service; the one providing for settlement without delay of the age-old claims of Indian tribes against the Government—claims which encourage idleness while awaiting a fortune; the clause which would throw safeguards around the uses to which Indian tribal funds may be put; the clause that would promote and protect genuine Indian arts and crafts; the clause that would establish a system of financial credit for the Indians—who are the only Americans denied the advantages of rural credit.

Many of these measures, it is readily obvious, will strike at greed and graft and the further exploiting by unscrupulous whites of a proud race we are reducing to abject pauperism and, ultimately, to total dependence on us.

If passed by the Seventy-third Congress, this legislation will reorganize the whole system of Indian affairs. It will put idle Indians back to work on Indian-owned land which can never be torn from them again, because it will be community owned. It will enable individual Indians, whose rentals from their little separate allotments are insufficient to exist on except in terrible poverty and squalor and disease, to consolidate, to turn thousands of futile little patches of grazing land into one big profitable range, to combine useless scraps of forest land into great forest blocks that can be operated by scientific experts for continuous, perpetual, and profitable yield.

A clean, healthy, prosperous Indian group is a blessing to any county, any State; whereas every destitute, contagion-ridden, despairing Indian settlement in existence today is a potential menace. So, even viewed selfishly, the white race must arouse itself and save this other gentle, gifted race which it has reduced by theft and maltreatment to a state of poverty and disease which, in some sections, is a menace to all of us at present.

Commissioner John Collier, pacing his office at the Indian Bureau the other day as he talked to the writer in his tense, earnest way, stressed vehemently the almost tragic importance of the passage of these new bills. He sketched the needed land reforms which I have outlined, and he said:

"This land reform is a prerequisite of all else. Without it we can do nothing lasting for the Indians. And surely there is no reform so clearly owed the Indians by the Government which has forcibly deprived them of their lands. Mexico, whose present government was not a party to the confiscation of the Indian lands, nevertheless recognizes its moral obligation to restore to all Indians enough land for a healthy living. And this restoration is being carried out in Mexico as a matter of duty by the government, nor does any Indian pay a dollar for the acreage restored to him. The Government buys the land from white owners and gives it to the Indian, and thereafter restricts its alienation and helps the Indian to organize to use his land effectively. Our duty of land restoration affects perhaps only 200,000 Indians, while Mexico, a very poor country, has assumed as a moral obligation the restoring of land to more than 2,000,000 Indians!"

"How would new land be procured for our Indians?" I inquired. "Through purchase?"

The Commissioner swung around to reply quickly: "Perhaps through purchase. Perhaps through colonizing these Indians on existing public domain, or through lending them money to buy the land themselves, or through giving them the submarginal lands which the Government is withdrawing from commercial farming. There are many possible ways. I realize that what we ask contemplates the expenditure of millions in reestablishing the Indians on the land and in capitalizing them for the use of the land. But—" He gazed out of the window of his office for a tense, sober moment, and then wheeled to say emphatically:

"But unless this is done, more than 200,000 of our allotted Indians—landless already or on the point of becoming landless—are increasingly going to become tramps, as many of them are already. That is a public menace a hundred times graver than investing some money now in colonizing these homeless Indians and putting them on their feet permanently."

Pushing forward a chair for me, and dropping into one himself, Commissioner Collier spread out before us a map on which all the Indian reservations were indicated. At Quinault, Wash., for instance, where the Indians are and always have been fishermen, valuable timber lands were allotted in small bits to a people who were neither lumbermen, farmers, nor stock raisers. The land had been stripped of its timber, and it was found that the cost of removing the large stumps left would exceed $200 an acre, considerably more than the land was worth. Here was a wanton destruction of valuable tribal forest which, under sustained-yield management, would have proved a permanent source of employment and of income to the tribal community.

In California (whose land area equals that of Japan) hundreds of Indian families have been allotted land on lava beds, waterless deserts, and even high mountain tops where frost strikes every month of the year. In Wisconsin, in Nebraska, in Minnesota, as throughout Oklahoma, allotment has reduced the Indian holdings to mere dots on the landscape, and in these States most of the Indians are today practically landless and homeless. In the Sioux country much of the allotted land borders on the Bad Lands of the Dakotas—soil on which a white farmer would starve without financial assistance from some other source. To expect the Indians and their families to extract a living from allotments of such barren land is inhuman.

Commissioner Collier cited pitiable instances of the sufferings of hard-working Indians who, receiving their allotments, step into legal trap after legal trap, set by ruthless whites, clinging frantically to the land they so love, and then inevitably losing it.

For example, up on the Blackfeet Reservation in northern Montana there is William Eats-Alone. Today he is sitting despondent and desperate, with his old wife at his side, in the home he has just lost through foreclosure. His children are gathered about him—homeless, too. Victims, all of them, of the vicious allotment system.

This simple, ignorant Indian, his wife, and their children were given contiguous allotments. They owned 4,000 acres among them, 400 cattle, and 100 horses. They were happy, hard-working, and prosperous so long as their land was held in trust. But their peace was not to last. Fee patents were forced on Eats-Alone and his wife, despite their vehement protests. They were callously declared competent and turned loose.

Immediately thereupon they became targets for unscrupulous whites. First, the local store man swung into action, demanding payment of a bill which always before had been carried over from one beef-selling time to another. To satisfy the merchant, Eats-Alone gave him a note. Next he was approached by a stock finance company and persuaded to buy more livestock in order to make bigger money. He agreed, becoming the possessor of 1,000 head of cattle, and placing a burdensome mortgage on his home to pay for them.

The price of livestock went tumbling. Eats-Alone saw all his stock taken from him. Then his house was foreclosed. Still the family clung on, as renters. They hoped to realize something from the children's allotments. But these, too, were lost through unpaid taxes. Today this fine old Indian and his family, once landed proprietors, are paupers. They are facing eviction. Where are they to go? What is to become of them?

"Again", continued Mr. Collier with dry indignation, "after 70 years we have not been able, despite our stupid pressure and compulsion, to force the Indian to merge with our white civilization, with the industrial life in our cities. He doesn't do it! Just why, no one understands. He clings tenaciously to the ancient civilization he understands and loves. Clan instinct, clan operation of assets, is inherent in him. The tribal Indian remains the self-reliant and self-supporting Indian."

"Isn't the solution, then", continued the Commissioner, "to encourage and strengthen that group loyalty in him, and help him to create his unique future right where he is, with his group? Our aim is to build up each such group, give it land, give it credit, give it technically trained leaders, teach it to pool its moneys and natural resources, and to operate them in perpetuity. That ideal is behind this legislation."

The Commissioner hastened to add that there are exceptions to every rule. And he gave assurance that no Indian who is succeeding as an individual farmer on his own land would be forced to a changed way of life by the consolidation plan. The plan aims merely to offer to desperate Indians operating their scattered bits unsuccessfully, and to landless Indians, a chance to come together, to own land in common and in perpetuity, to organize, and eventually, as a group, to learn to run their own affairs. And he stressed that every Indian wanting it must be given advanced training for the professions.

Dismissing the land question for the moment, the Indian Commissioner touched briefly on some of the other vital clauses in the bill. The use of Indian tribal capital for the maintenance of the Indian Bureau or for doles to Indians, he insisted, must be stopped! This procedure has resulted in bankruptcy for nine tenths of the tribes who have had tribal funds. It has thrown away $750,000,000 of the Indians' trust funds since 1900, more than five times the amount which would suffice to establish the whole Indian race in self-support on its own lands. Tribal capital should be used for the production of new capital, or for educating the Indians to use their natural resources.

He touched next on the education of the Indians. Under the able direction of Dr. W. Carson Ryan, formerly of Swarthmore, a leading American authority on education, this process is going forward as rapidly as possible, with thrillingly successful results.

So far as education is concerned, this is indeed the dawning of a new day for our abused, neglected little Indian. With the aid of the Public Works fund, beautiful modern day schools are being erected in the Indian country. They are being built by the Indians, of native materials, under the supervision of white architects and artists. They are designed to resemble the native architecture in outline and to blend artistically with the native landscape. Here will be worked out a plan of education and social welfare suited to native needs, as well as the encouragement and development of Indian talents, arts and crafts, and community activities. This education will start with the community itself in family groups, extending to the younger children as fast as the families can be led to ask for it.

While the Commissioner was discussing future Indian education, Dr. Ryan came into the room and enthusiastically joined us. All three of us looked back to the abominable days of 1923 in the Indian Service.

Dr. Ryan reminded the writer that one of the most terrible things about those old-time boarding schools was the tender age of the children imprisoned in them far from home. Only smaller children were in evidence in those boarding schools—pitiful masses of them, alive with vermin, clad in rags, snatching at bits of food like famished animals, standing long hours at ironing boards and washtubs, suffering blows, cowering in school jails for infringement of minor rules.

"But today all that is changed," Dr. Ryan assured me. "The hunger and the nakedness, the abuse and child labor are gone, and so are the little tots. Only older children, in most cases, are sent to the boarding schools. The old horrors are done away!"

And then he added casually, "We owe this reform largely to the dramatization of the shocking facts by such forces as Good Housekeeping (in a series of articles in 1929) and the American Indian Defense Association."

In no uncertain terms he gave credit to you, readers of Good Housekeeping, for what you accomplished, and his message was: You brought about results before. You can do still more today.

A lump rose in my throat as he talked. And I thought with gratitude of what you had helped to bring about: The rescue of some 22,000 little children from a children's hell.

"What of health conditions on the reservations?" I asked at last.

Mr. Collier replied: "Horrible! Health conditions are very grave! You recall how shocking they were 5 years ago. There has been some slight improvement. Not much. The Indian tuberculosis rate is still about seven times that of the general population. And the infant and child mortality runs about half as high as the tuberculosis rate! Trachoma is still endemic among the Indians. In the Navajo country the trachomatous Indians are more than 20 percent of the total."

The shortage of hospitals—even though 15 new ones are being built—of hospital maintenance and of nursing personnel, Mr. Collier declared, is a problem of the gravest urgency.

"Our nurses are cruelly overworked. I could cite you instance after instance. But one will suffice. Recently in a 60-bed hospital we found one nurse on night duty. She had, among the 60 patients, 2 new obstetrical cases, 1 newly operated on for gallstones with drainage, 1 boy with 7 feet of intestine removed 5 days before and barely living, 2 bad cases of tuberculosis. We expect her to handle this and be in the receiving ward for any automobile accident cases brought in. This is inhuman to the patient—and to the nurse. And such conditions spread infection."

"You have asked for appropriations to correct this?" I inquired.

"Yes. We have told the Appropriations Committee of the House that the situation in our Indian hospitals is scandalous and dangerous."

"Your appeal has been without result?"

"As yet, completely without result!"

Before leaving I picked up his list of legislative items being urged on the Seventy-third Congress.

"Of all these proposals, which are you most anxious to have the public mass itself behind?" I asked.

"The land legislation," Mr. Collier answered quickly. "It is the foundation of our whole program of reform. The fundamental need. It must be passed."

That day and the next in Washington I "tried out" the proposed legislation on one noted authority after another in the Indian welfare field. I submitted it to Members of Congress. I finally took it to the Secretary of the Interior.

It is he whom I shall quote first.

"I am wholeheartedly behind this bill," he informed me with emphasis. "I am strongly in favor of preserving Indian civilization and of letting the Indians have their own culture and religion, and develop their own arts. They seem to thrive best in a group life. Therefore we should strengthen and build up the group."

"Has the Oklahoma project—wresting the Five Civilized Tribes away from their present guardians and returning them to the protection of the Federal Government—the full support of the Interior Department?" was my next inquiry.

"It has. Mr. Collier wouldn't be Indian Commissioner if I didn't believe completely in his attitude on the Indian question. He has made substantial progress during his year as Commissioner, and I am very happy indeed over what he has achieved for the Indians."

"Have you any comment on the land legislation, Mr. Secretary?"

"Only this—that it has my strong endorsement. The Indians are essentially a land-using and land-loving people; and they ought to have land enough to make it possible for them to live in peace and comfort. They can live on submarginal land that whites cannot live on. And now that we're taking over submarginal land, we are partly in a position to give them enough to satisfy their requirements and establish them as a self-supporting group of the population. This would restore their self-respect, and also relieve the Treasury of their support."

"You feel that a new day is dawning for the Indians?" I asked Secretary Ickes.

"I hope so. That certainly is what we are trying to bring about. But strong public sympathy and support will be needed behind all these bills."

It was to Miss Julia K. Jaffray, chairman of the department of welfare of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, that I next put the question, "What is your reaction to the proposed legislation?"

"Mrs. Grace Morrison Poole, president of the federation," Miss Jaffray replied, "authorizes the statement that the federation is ready to support the program of the administration and the Indian Bureau for a gradual issuing of charters to Indian tribes as they show readiness and ability for self-government. The federation will also support the principles of the legislation which seeks to restore Indian lands to their rightful owners, provide land for landless Indians, consolidate Indian lands for economic purposes, and other land reform measures."

"The federation is arranging to support the legislation which Congress will consider for increased health service for Indians; State cooperation in education, medical attention, and the relief of distress among Indians; the responsible accounting for Indian and Indian Service moneys, and effective congressional control over expenditures; and the protection of Indian tribal funds, giving Indians a voice in their own expenditure."

"Mrs. J. Marc Fowler, chairman of the Division of Indian Welfare, gives assurance that this legislative activity will in no way curtail the primary interest of the federation, which is the improvement of home and living conditions among the Indians. Federation women are working actively on 17 reservations in close cooperation with the Extension Service of the Indian Bureau."

LXXVIII—352

This home improvement work will assume even greater importance as the rights of our Indian citizens are granted."

Thus the women's clubs of the United States place themselves solidly behind the new legislation.

From Matthew K. Sniffen, secretary of the Indian Rights Association, the writer also obtained a hearty endorsement of every main objective in the new bill. Mr. Sniffen is one of the leading authorities in the United States on the Indian problem.

And Dr. Haven Emerson, president of the American Indian Defense Association, offered the following powerful word of approval:

"This plan is conceived in terms of the Indian as an Indian, not as a white man. It rests upon the wise consideration that only by his own hands can the Indian save himself. It provides for the continuation of the Federal Government's guardianship. Yet within this protection, it sets the Indian free to work out his destiny. It scraps the vicious allotment system. In providing for the creation of Indian communities, it goes back to social forms native to Indian culture, experience, and character. Yet it strengthens these forms with modern technic of mass cooperation."

"Congress must enact the Ickes and Collier program if the 'new deal' is to extend to the Nation's wards. There is certain extinction for the Indian race unless the present weight of bad laws is lifted from its back. If Congress will not adopt the wise and practical plan urged by competent experts within and without the Government, the road of the future for the Indians leads only to a dead end."

What—finally—of the temper of Congress toward this new legislation which it is even now considering?

From Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, Chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee of the Senate, came a blanket endorsement of the legislative program. "Of course I'm for it," he commented briefly. "These principles are what we've been working for for years."

From Congressman EDGAR HOWARD, who is Chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee of the House, came the strongest possible expression of approval. "I am overwhelmingly in favor of the program of Secretary Ickes and Commissioner Collier," he said. "I am glad to know at last that the Interior Department is officered by men with souls, who will throw themselves into the effort to save our Indians from further spoliation by the white man. Practically every treaty negotiated by the United States Government with the American Indians has been ruthlessly violated. The Indians never had a chance till now. And it will be my pleasure to do all in my power as an individual and as Chairman of the Indian Affairs Committee of the House to promote the program of Commissioner Collier."

And, finally, the following glowing endorsement came from Senator BRONSON CUTTING, progressive Republican, senior Senator from New Mexico, and a close friend of the President since childhood.

"This outline of proposed Indian legislation reveals the realism of Mr. Collier's ideals. Here is contained the restoration of the dignity of a people and an invitation to the Indian for his individual participation in his own affairs."

"Mr. Collier has devoted 15 years to the study of Indian affairs; he is an intelligent man of penetrating honesty and social vision. Surely there is no one with such a rich background of experience of Indian administration; or one better equipped to consolidate and simplify, as illustrated in these proposed bills, the true welfare of the Indian people and governmental administration."

Readers of Good Housekeeping, help Commissioner Collier! Write to your Senators and Representatives, urging them to sponsor this proposed Indian legislation. It has friends in Congress—and out. A host of staunch friends. But it also has enemies in Congress—and out. Grim enemies! It will not be enacted without a struggle. Probably it will not be enacted without a terrific battle.

The outcome of that battle will depend, to an enormous degree, on you.

You believe that Congress must pass the Ickes-Collier program in the present session—to save the Indians' land from further depredations, give them local self-government, and provide for the training of Indian youth—write your Senators and Congressmen to support these bills:

Howard bill (H.R. 7902, and Wheeler bill (S. 2755): For a new Indian landholding system; more land for Indians; home rule for Indians under Federal guardianship; and widened education for Indians.

Wheeler bill (S. 2531), and Hayden bill (S. 2499): Establishing the boundaries of the Navajo Reservation; enlarging the Navajo landholdings; and bringing the Navajo grazing lands into solid blocks.

Johnson-O'Malley bill (S. 2571), and House Joint Resolution 257: Providing for cooperation between the Federal Government and the States in Indian education, medical service, distress relief, and general welfare.

Howard bill (H.R. 7600), and Wheeler bill (S. 2671): Repealing the espionage and gag laws affecting Indians.

A CENTURY OF PROGRESS—CHICAGO WORLD'S FAIR CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION (H.DOC. NO. 293)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Commission to the end that legislation may be enacted extending the availability of funds previously appropriated for Government participation in A Century of Progress, the Chicago world's fair centennial celebration, in 1933, to June 30, 1935, and also authorizing the appropriation of funds in the amount of $405,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the reopening of A Century of Progress, the Chicago world's fair centennial celebration, in 1934.

REPEAL OF ALASKA PROHIBITION LAW—RETURN OF A BILL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the request contained in the resolution of the Senate of March 27, 1934 (the House of Representatives concurring therein), I return herewith Senate bill no. 2729, entitled "An act to repeal an act of Congress entitled 'An act to prohibit the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes', approved February 14, 1917, and for other purposes."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—VETO MESSAGE (H. DOC. NO. 291)

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the reconsideration of the bill vetoed by the President, the independent offices appropriation bill, is a matter of high privilege. I stated yesterday that there was no disposition to delay final action on this subject. I therefore announce that I am willing that the message shall be laid before the Senate and read and that the Senate shall proceed to vote upon the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval H.R. 6663, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes." I am impelled to do this on a number of grounds, any one of them sufficient to require disapproval of the bill.

In March 1933 the Congress passed, and I signed, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government." This law became one of the principal pillars of national recovery for the clear reason that for the first time in many years the recurring annual expenses for the maintenance of the Government were brought within the current revenues of the Government. It is true that very large but wholly distinct funds are being dispensed daily for emergency purposes, but these funds are going directly to the purpose of saving farms, saving homes, and giving relief and employment to millions of our fellow citizens. They are nonrecurring in nature, while the increases contemplated in this bill are continuous and permanent.

Furthermore, the Budget submitted by me to the Congress on January 4, 1934, laid down a definite program of expenditures and a definite estimate of receipts. Because of the emergency expenditures for relief and unemployment, the expected total deficits this year and in 1935 are necessarily large; but at the same time a program for a completely balanced Budget by June 30, 1936, was determined upon as a definite objective.

The bill exceeds the estimates submitted by me in the sum of $228,000,000. I am compelled to take note of the fact that in creating this excess the Congress has failed at the same time to provide a similar sum by additional taxation. Moreover, to the extent that the amount of money appropriated by the Congress is in excess of my Budget estimates, and in the absence of provision for additional revenues, there must be a decrease in the funds available for essential relief work.

This bill increases the compensation for employees of the United States Government $125,000,000 over my Budget estimates for this purpose. I have great sympathy for the employees, but I cannot forget that millions of American citizens are today still without employment, and reduction in the compensation of Federal employees has been and still is on the average less than the reduction in compensation that has been patiently endured by those citizens not in the employ of the United States Government.

Let me be specific. This bill makes a portion of the restored compensation retroactive to February 1, 1934. I believe it unwise to establish this precedent, and I cannot overlook the serious administrative difficulties involved in paying back pay to individuals, many of whom are no longer in the employ of the Government.

The bill also contains several discriminatory provisions, such as paying employees in some departments of the Government 48 hours' pay for 40 hours' work.

In submitting the Budget estimates last December, I recommended compensation restoration of 5 percent for the next fiscal year. The cost of living seems to be rising slowly. The present authority is not responsive enough to changing conditions. I therefore shall be glad to confer with the Congress on improving the methods of restoring Federal pay so that in actual practice the pay will keep ahead of the cost of living increases instead of lagging behind. Adjustments can well be made immediately on the passage of appropriate legislation followed by more frequent adjustments in the future.

I come now to the provisions in this act relating to World War veterans. First let me speak of principles. Last October I said this to the American Legion Convention:

The first principle, following inevitably from the obligation of citizens to bear arms, is that the Government has a responsibility for and toward those who suffered injury or contracted disease while serving in its defense.

The second principle is that no person, because he wore a uniform must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens. The fact of wearing a uniform does not mean that he can demand and receive from his Government a benefit which no other citizen receives. It does not mean that because a person served in the defense of his country, performed a basic obligation of citizenship, he should receive a pension from his Government because of a disability incurred after his service had terminated, and not connected with that service.

It does mean, however, that those who were injured in or as a result of their service, are entitled to receive adequate and generous compensation for their disabilities. It does mean that generous care shall be extended to the dependents of those who died in or as a result of service to their country.

I am very confident that the American people, including the overwhelming majority of veterans themselves, approve these principles and in the last analysis will support them.

Applying them to the provisions of this bill, I cannot give it my approval.

Last year it was determined—and I had hoped permanently—that a service-connected disability is a question of fact rather than a question of law. In other words, each individual case should and must be considered on its merits, and there is no justification for legislative dicta which, contrary to fact, provide that thousands of individual cases of sickness which commenced 4, 5, or 6 years after the termination of the war are caused by war services. Therefore local boards were established—boards on which 3 out of the 5 members were in no way connected with the Veterans'

Administration and on which two thirds of those serving were ex-service men. These local boards approved disallowances in the cases of 29,000 veterans and these decisions were unanimous in 94 percent of the cases. Not content with that, I created a board of appeals, the majority of which again are in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and a majority of which are ex-service men. This board is now engaged in hearing appeals of those cases disallowed by the local boards.

A few weeks ago I gave approval to an amendment the purpose of which was, pending the determination of their appeals, to restore to the rolls at 75 percent of their compensation those veterans in whose cases the presumption of service connection was disallowed by the local boards. This, however, was rejected in the Congress. I intend now by regulation forthwith to direct an appeal by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in each and every one of these disallowed 29,000 cases with the further direction that in the final determination of these cases every reasonable doubt be resolved in favor of the veteran, and every assistance be rendered in the preparation and presentation of these cases. While these cases are pending the veteran will be paid 75 percent of the compensation they received prior to the time they were removed from the rolls. If the appeal is allowed, they will receive back compensation. Only in cases disallowed by the board of appeals will the veteran thereafter be permanently removed from the rolls. This regulation will be put into effect at once.

By reason of the fact that many totally and permanently disabled veterans have been the recipients of benefits from their Government for a long period of time, it is difficult in the event of a disallowance of service connection by the final board of appeals to remove them completely from the rolls. Existing regulations, therefore, provide that if their cases are disallowed and if they are found to be totally and permanently disabled they shall, notwithstanding fundamental principles enunciated, if in need, receive $30 a month and domiciliary care and hospitalization.

It is a simple and undeniable fact that the United States, in terms of compensation and in terms of hospitalization, has done and is doing infinitely more for our veterans and their dependents than any other government.

I come now to the provisions of the bill relating to Spanish-American War veterans. To this group of ex-service men I have devoted much thought. Because of their age, they command sympathy. Nevertheless, we must recognize also that many abuses have crept into the laws granting them benefits.

The Spanish-American War veterans' amendment to this act provides for service pensions. This violates the principles upon which benefits to veterans should be paid and the principles to which I have referred in this message. Moreover, if that principle should in the future be applied to the World War veterans at the same rate as contemplated for Spanish-American War veterans by this bill, the annual and continuing charge upon the people of this country by 1949 will amount to more than $830,000,000 for that item alone. This would be in addition to the large cost of all existing veterans' benefits and future hospitalization. This I cannot approve.

However, I am today directing the restoration to the rolls of those Spanish-American War veterans who in 1920 were receiving pensions as a result of having sustained an injury or incurred a disease arising out of their war service.

By Regulation 12 a presumption of service origin was extended to Spanish-American War veterans on the rolls on March 19, 1933. In order to take the same action which I am taking in regard to World War veterans, I am directing the restoration to the rolls, as of this date, at 75 percent of the amount they were receiving on March 19, 1933, all Spanish-American War veterans pending a final determination of their cases before the Board of Appeals.

Without going further into all of the details relating to the treatment—past, present, and future—of Spanish-American War veterans, it seems sufficient to repeat that I am wholly and irrevocably opposed to the principle of the general service pension, but I do seek to provide with liberality for all those who suffered because of their service in that war. As in the case of World War veterans, I shall not hesitate to further alter or modify the regulations in order that substantial justice may be done in every individual case.

What you and I are seeking is justice and fairness in the individual case. I call your specific attention to the fact that since the original regulations were established a year ago actual experience has shown many cases where these regulations required modification. I have not hesitated to take the necessary action and have issued regulations which have made many changes. These changes based on principles of justice to the individual veteran involve additional expenditures of approximately $117,000,000. It goes without saying that I shall not hesitate to make further changes if the principles of justice demand them.

On the basis of the original regulations following the Economy Act, the annual cost to the United States of veterans' relief was $486,000,000. Since that time by Executive order the addition of $117,000,000 increases to $603,000,000 the total cost for veterans' relief for the fiscal year 1935.

My disapproval of this bill is not based solely on the consideration of dollars and cents. There is a deeper consideration. You and I are concerned with the principles herein enunciated. I trust that the Congress will continue to cooperate with me in our common effort to restore general prosperity and relieve distress.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, it has been apparent ever since the passage of the Economy Act that justice for the disabled ex-service man could be obtained only by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

The time for action has come. This is the test vote. None of the other votes in the last session or in the present session is going to be of any comparative importance. The proceedings up to date have been merely what might be called sparring for position. This is the decisive vote as to whether or not we mean to do anything substantial for the veterans who were disabled in the service of their country.

I submit that the Senate has gone on record so many times in this session of Congress that it is perfectly apparent what the beliefs of the individual Members of this body are on this subject. I shall try to elaborate on that a little in the course of my remarks, but I think every veteran in the land knows perfectly well that if Members of this body follow the convictions they have previously voted, they will vote at the present time to override the veto.

Mr. President, I desire to make one possible exception. I notice that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is doing me the honor to listen to my remarks. At the last session of Congress I had occasion to criticize what seemed to be the inconsistency of some of the votes of the Senator from Virginia. I desire to say now that in anything I am going to say today I except the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], because he alone, of all the Members of the Senate, made it perfectly clear on the floor that he was opposed both to the Senate amendments and to the House amendments; that he thought them both unjustifiable. Having so stated, having made his position perfectly clear, the Senator from Virginia, of course, will be absolutely consistent in going down the line in favor of sustaining the veto. I do not believe, however, there is another Member of the Senate—and I think I can prove it from the record up to date—who can reconcile his previous votes with a vote to sustain the veto.

Mr. President, I hope I shall be absolved from any accusation of partisanship. In the 20 or 25 years in which I have been more or less engaged in political activity, I have supported as many Democrats as I have Republicans. I do not believe that any Senator can point to a public utterance of mine in which I have mentioned the word "Democrat" or "Republican" except to say that under present conditions there is no substantial issue which divides the two political parties. If in the course of my remarks I shall speak of "this side of the aisle" and "the other side of the aisle", I shall do so merely in a geographical sense. I shall not do it in order to indict any political party.

Mr. President, I feel that our responsibility here to the people of the United States is individual and not partisan. The responsibility which any Member of this body takes in his votes is a responsibility which he owes first to his constituents, and secondly to the people of the United States. If I may be pardoned a further personal observation, I think Senators know that I supported the Democratic candidate for the Presidency at the last election, that I have no apologies to offer for that position, that I would do so again if I had the chance, and that I hope to maintain in the future the personal friendship with the President of the United States, which has been my privilege for the past 40 years.

When I speak of the President, I desire to have it understood that I am speaking of him as the Chief Executive of the Nation. If I speak of the President's veto, I want Senators to understand that I know that any man in the position of the President of the United States is unable to give personal attention to the number of details which are discussed in a veto message of this kind. Now, apart from personal turns of phrase, this veto message might just as well have been written by President Harding, President Coolidge, or President Hoover. I think I can show to the Senate later on that the same ideas were embodied in the veto message of President Hoover, sent to the Senate in 1930.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is my conviction, and I trust the Senator from New Mexico shares it, that the President's fine leadership is not involved in this controversy. As Chief Executive, he is doing his duty as he sees it. As Senators of the United States, we are called upon to do our duty as we see it.

Mr. CUTTING. I am sure of that, Mr. President; and I am sure that the very substantial majority which voted against the President in the House of Representatives yesterday had no feeling of personal animosity toward Franklin D. Roosevelt as an individual; that that vote was based on considerations of public policy, with which I believe we, too, are concerned to the exclusion of any other possible consideration.

With that preface, Mr. President, I hope I may be allowed to discuss some of the factors which enter into the present situation and which the President has discussed in his message.

In the first place, the President bases his opposition on his continued desire to keep the expenses of the Government within the revenues of the Government. He makes a distinction between recurring expenses, which he considers part of the regular Budget, and nonrecurring expenses, under which he includes—

Saving farms, saving homes, and giving relief and employment to millions of our fellow citizens.

Mr. President, I do not think any of us who are in touch with the present situation believe that those expenditures for relief are going to be cut down for a great many years. We do not believe they can be. A distinction between recurring and nonrecurring expenditures is, therefore, I submit, mainly a paper distinction.

The President goes on to argue that the position taken by both Houses of Congress will be unfavorable to balancing the Budget. I do not care to discuss any such question at the present time any more than I care to discuss the question raised in the next paragraph, which is that Congress has not provided any method for collecting the extra taxes required to pay for this particular item.

I think that everybody knows that at various times during the present session the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has recommended the appropriation of money over and beyond the Budget estimates, and that in not one of those cases so far has there been any suggestion that the Congress should provide for extra taxation.

The President goes on to criticize the so-called "5-to-5 pay plan" for Federal employees. That plan was first offered on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. While I know that the Senator from South Carolina did not implicate anyone else in his proposal, I think that if the question is raised I can show by the debates in both Houses of Congress that it was assumed in both Houses that the proposal offered by the Senator from South Carolina would receive the approval of the Executive.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator does not say that I made that statement?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, no; I do not. The Senator from South Carolina was very clear about his position, and distinctly stated that he was not quoting anyone else. But the fact remains that that assumption was made, and I think it was a legitimate assumption from the course of the debate.

The President goes on to say in the same connection that—

The bill also contains several discriminatory provisions, such as paying employees in some departments of the Government 48 hours' pay for 40 hours' work.

Mr. President, is not that exactly the same plan which is being proposed to industry at the present time? Is not that in effect what the N.R.A. is trying to do, to pay the same amount of wages for shorter periods of labor? If so, how can we make a discrimination on a matter of principle between what the Government is willing to do itself and what it is urging industry to do?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does that refer to the class of employees who are working in navy yards, and who have had their hours of labor reduced from 48 to 40?

Mr. CUTTING. I cannot interpret what the President's message means. I can quote his language to the Senator:

The bill also contains several discriminatory provisions, such as paying employees in some departments of the Government 48 hours' pay for 40 hours' work.

Mr. WALSH. The navy-yard employees have been contending that their hours of employment were reduced from 48 to 40, and that their wages were reduced at the same time from the 48-hour wage to the 40-hour wage. I think the reference is to that.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, that may be so. All I can say in that connection is that the principle seems to be inconsistent with the principle which the administration has been maintaining with regard to other matters.

Mr. President, I consider that everything I have said so far is secondary to the main principle on which the President has vetoed the bill, and since the President is speaking of principles, I think I ought to read in detail what he says:

I come now to the provisions in this act relating to World War veterans. First let me speak of principles. Last October I said this to the American Legion convention:

"The first principle, following inevitably from the obligation of citizens to bear arms, is that the Government has a responsibility for and toward those who suffered injury or contracted disease while serving in its defense.

"The second principle is that no person, because he wore a uniform must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens. The fact of wearing a uniform does not mean that he can demand and receive from his Government a benefit which no other citizen receives. It does not mean that because a person served in the defense of his country, performed a basic obligation of citizenship, he should receive a pension from his Government because of a disability incurred after his service had terminated, and not connected with that service."

Mr. President, it will be noted that the first principle of the President follows what he calls the basic obligation of citizenship, namely, to bear arms in the defense of the country. That has not always been necessarily accepted as a basic principle of citizenship, because, of course, if it had been, we should not have made exceptions in the late war for conscientious objectors.

Furthermore, even if we grant that it is a basic principle of citizenship to bear arms in defense of the country, there might easily be a question raised as to whether the late war was a war in defense of the country. Personally, I approved of the action of the United States in entering that war, but many of the most conscientious men in this body, including the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], voted against the entrance of the United States into the war, because they did not think the United States was concerned in any way with the outcome of it.

Granting that it is a basic obligation of the citizen to defend the country under arms, does that necessarily apply to the circumstances which we now have to consider? I doubt it.

The second principle which the President stated to the American Legion was that "no person, because he wore a uniform, must therefore be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens."

Nobody has claimed at any time that there was an endeavor to place the veterans in a class of preferred beneficiaries. The contention of those who have argued in favor of veterans' legislation is that the veterans were in 1917 placed in a class of permanent handicap, that they were drafted by the two Houses of Congress, and whether they wanted to do so or did not want to do so, they were obliged, by our action, for which we have the responsibility, to become permanently a class suffering a distinct hardship as compared with their fellow citizens. It is true that many men, from a high sense of patriotism, volunteered, but the fact remains that if they had not volunteered in most cases they would have been drafted just the same; so that the responsibility for what happened lies squarely on the shoulders of the two Houses of the Congress of the United States.

These men took 2 years of their life away from their ordinary occupations. Even if they were not wounded or disabled, they still were at a handicap, on the average, as compared with their fellow citizens. When unemployment came on these men, if they were able to obtain employment after they came back, were the first ones to be let out. They have never, as a class—and I use the word "class" in no derogatory sense—been able to get back the position of equality which they would have held with their remaining fellow citizens in this country if that war had not come on and if Congress had not taken the action which it did take.

That is the reason for the so-called "bonus legislation" for the adjusted-compensation certificates. You took these men—I will not call them a class; they were not a class, they were a generation—you took a generation of American manhood and put them at a permanent handicap as against the generations before them and the generations to come.

Now, how can it be said that those who are in favor of veterans' legislation are trying to put that generation in a class of special beneficiaries? We are trying to do something in a small measure to take them out of the class of men who have endured a discriminatory hardship.

The President goes on to say:

I am very confident that the American people, including the overwhelming majority of veterans themselves, approve these principles and in the last analysis will support them.

I am sure, Mr. President, that the President of the United States is in error in that statement. I am sure that he made it in good faith, but I think, perhaps, through my acquaintance in some detail with matters of this kind, I may state with some assurance that the President is incorrect in speaking, as he attempts to speak, for a majority of the veterans of the late war.

It is a strange thing, Mr. President, in comparing the last war with the great conflict which raged in this country between 1861 and 1865, that the after effects with regard to the veterans were so different. No one ever urged after the Civil War that service connection, definitely established by strict and rigorous methods of proof, was necessary in order to maintain a claim against the Government. After the Civil War, during the four Presidential elections which followed, four times the Presidency was conferred upon a man who was himself a veteran and who knew the problems of the veterans at first hand. We have had four elections since the World War, and in no one of those elections has a man been elected as President of the United States who at first hand understood the veterans' problems.

That may be a good thing. I am not criticizing it. But I think it follows that so far as the particular problem of veterans' legislation is concerned that there are many men in both Houses of Congress who understand the veterans' problems better than any President who has served in that exalted office since the end of the World War.

I now desire to read the President's paragraph on the so-called "presumptive cases", because that, after all, is the basic problem with which we are confronted. Are these cases justifiably on the roll or are they not? If they are justifiably on the roll, no other consideration, no question about finances, no question of balancing a Budget on paper, ought to prevent these men from obtaining their rights. If they are not justly on the rolls, they ought never to have been on the rolls, no matter how prosperous the condition of the country. Now, let me read the President's remarks:

Last year it was determined—and I had hoped permanently—that a service-connected disability is a question of fact rather than a question of law. In other words, each individual case should and must be considered on its merits and there is no justification for legislative dicta which, contrary to fact, provide that thousands of individual cases of sickness which commenced 4, 5, or 6 years after the termination of the war are caused by war service. Therefore local boards were established—boards on which 3 out of the 5 members were in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and on which two thirds of those serving were ex-service men. These local boards approved disallowances in the cases of 29,000 veterans and these decisions were unanimous in 94 percent of the cases. Not content with that, I created a Board of Appeals, the majority of which again are in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration and a majority of which are ex-service men. This Board is now engaged in hearing appeals of those cases disallowed by the local boards.

The first statement the President makes in that paragraph is that these presumptions are contrary to fact.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. A short time ago I had occasion to discuss with a member of one of these local boards hearing presumptive cases the result of its investigations and hearings. He informed me that the board of which he was a member reported favorably upon less than 40 percent of these presumptive cases; but he added that in his personal judgment, out of 500 cases, practically all but 2 were traceable to their war service. I asked him why he did not make a finding in the other cases that these veterans with presumptive claims were suffering from diseases that were traceable to war service, and he replied that the regulations and rules which the Veterans' Administration adopted forbid him to exercise his own personal judgment. In other words, he had to find certain facts and have certain evidence adduced in order to decide that former presumptive cases were, under the new regulations, entitled to be placed back on the rolls. I then concluded that the regulations of the Bureau have prevented many of these presumptives from getting their compensation as was intended by the Congress.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator's informant was entirely correct, and the Senator is entirely correct, and he is one of the Members of this body who best understands the technical aspects of the veterans' problems.

I could argue about the regulations adopted by the Board, and the regulations which were set down for them by the Veterans' Bureau, for an unconscionable length of time. I do not attempt to do so because it would be very difficult for most Members of the Senate who have not been engaged in this sort of work to realize the subtle differences between one word and another—words which may in the conception of a layman mean exactly the same thing.

When the Senator from Massachusetts rose it was not my intention to discuss the technical details of the matter but merely to call attention to the fact that this language of the President stating that the presumption is contrary to fact is almost identical with the language which Mr. Hoover laid down in his veto message on June 26, 1930.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Before the Senator embarks upon that phase of his discussion and leaves the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, will not the Senator take time to explain that the regulations under which the central Board of Appeals is conducting its operations are the same regulations as those which bound and hog-tied the special review board?

Mr. CUTTING. I was coming to that, Mr. President. I want to take it up in another order.

Mr. STEIWER. Then I am sorry I interrupted. I think it is tremendously important that the Record should show that those restrictive orders have never been changed and—

Mr. CUTTING. They will not be changed, so far as we know, under the regulations which the President in his veto message promises to put into effect.

Mr. STEIWER. The pending bill will change those regulations.

Mr. CUTTING. The pending bill will change them; but if the veto of the President should be sustained, the veterans of whom the Senator speaks will get no relief whatever under the provisions which the President promises to put into the regulations. Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I agree thoroughly with that statement.

Mr. CUTTING. Now let me read from Mr. Hoover. Before I read let me remind Members of the Senate that Mr. Hoover is not speaking of the 5-year presumption which has been in force since 1924. He is speaking of a proposition that was brought up for the first time then under the so-called "Rankin bill" to extend the presumptive period from 5 years to 10 years. I quote:

This provision would give war-disability benefits to from seventy-five to one hundred thousand men who were not disabled as the result of war. In other words, the bill purports to establish that men who have enjoyed good health for a minimum of 7 years (from 1918 to 1925) since the war, or a maximum of 12 years (to 1930), and who have then become afflicted, have received such affliction from their war service.

I am informed by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau—

Mind you where President Hoover placed the responsibility—

by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau that the medical council of the Bureau, consisting of most eminent physicians and surgeons, supported by the whole experience of the Bureau, agree conclusively that this legal "presumption" that affliction from diseases mentioned in the bill between 1925 and 1930 is not a physical possibility and that the presumption constitutes a wholly false and fictitious basis for legislation in veterans' aid. This is confirmed by a recent resolution of so eminent a body as the American Medical Association.

Mr. President, when that bill was under discussion two Members of this body—the only Members of this body, I will say, who were competent to form judgment on a question of that kind—the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], both eminent physicians, took occasion to vote against that dictum by doctors of the Veterans' Bureau. The Senator from West Virginia went before the committee and read from the most eminent medical authorities printed statements confirmatory of the fact that it was impossible for anyone to say how long the germ of tuberculosis or how long the seeds of insanity might remain latent in a patient before they became sufficiently pronounced to justify a medical finding. I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he will not confirm that statement?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in response to the eminent Senator from New Mexico, I may say he is absolutely correct, and when he makes the statement he does he makes it in conformity to and in uniformity with the conclusions of every medical man who is in print today on the subject, whether it be in the United States of America or in some other country.

Mr. CUTTING. I thank the Senator from West Virginia. Of course, I am incompetent to pass judgment on a matter of this kind, but I have long been convinced from observation that what the Senator from West Virginia has stated is correct. Remember, Mr. President, that in 1930 the American Medical Association merely criticized the extension of the presumption from 1925 to 1930; they disapproved of the 10-year presumption. It was not until last year that they ever ventured to criticize the 5-year presumption which had been in effect since 1924.

The President goes on to talk about the boards. Several weeks ago I took occasion at length to review the action which the various appeal boards had taken in the different States of the Union. I was arguing then under a time limit, and I can assure the Senate that three or four times as much criticism could be made of the action of these boards as I had occasion to bring to the attention of the Senate at that time. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate now to do so, because I do not think any Senator will rise upon the floor of the Senate to try to justify the discrimination which was shown in the work of the boards in the different sections of the United States. In some States 75 percent of the presumptive cases were retained on the rolls; in others only 22 to 25 percent were retained. The lowest percentage in any department of the United States, lower even than the percentage at Hines, Ill., or Pittsburgh, Pa., was the percentage at the central office in Washington, D.C., the office which made the original ruling and dictated the provisions under which the boards acted and which in the last analysis will be responsible for the results of the cases now on appeal to the central Board. Yet that is all the hope the President holds out to these presumptive cases which have been disallowed.

He says that in 94 percent of the cases the disallowing decisions were unanimous. Mr. President, of course they were unanimous. How could they have been other than unanimous under the regulations which these special boards were forced to use, regulations dating from the original Economy Act, which practically did away with presumption altogether?

I have previously gone into those details, and I do not think there is any occasion to go into them again, unless some Senator shall dispute the facts. I think every Senator realizes that those are facts, and that when these 29,000 cases come before the review board, most of them, at least, will continue to be disallowed, because, under the regulations, there is no option for the reviewing authorities to do anything else.

But the President says a majority of the Board of Appeals is composed of ex-service men.

In what way, Mr. President, is that relevant to the subject at issue? Anybody could pick a board composed entirely of ex-service men, members of the Economy League, members of the newly formed Veterans' Association, which is composed of a few rich men who happened to be in the service and who are interested in reducing their taxes. There is actually an official of the Veterans' Association now holding office as a member of the central Board of Appeals. What a farce it is! What new regulations under such circumstances can possibly do any benefit to these men who have been cut off the rolls?

Mr. President, as I stated before, I am not desirous of criticizing the President. I think, however, he has fallen into a number of inconsistencies. I have said that I did not agree with him about the veterans' belief in his principles, and I think it can be shown from this very message that he himself does not altogether believe in his principles, because later on in the message he goes on to say that—

Existing regulations therefore provide that if their cases are disallowed—

Meaning disallowance of service connection by the final Board of Appeals—and if they are found to be totally and permanently disabled, they shall, notwithstanding fundamental principles enunciated, if in need, receive $30 a month and domiciliary care and hospitalization.

That is clearly a violation of the principle that no man who wore the uniform should be put in a special class of benefits in comparison with other citizens.

The President, of course, takes that action for humanitarian reasons; but the humanitarianism which limits a man with a wife and children, a man totally disabled and unable, in many cases, to move, a pension of $30 a month does not go very far. So, without reaching a really humanitarian basis, without doing any substantial, practical good to these unfortunate men, the President has, nevertheless, by his own confession, violated the principles which he laid down at the beginning of his message with regard to this class of disabled veterans.

The same thing occurs later on in his message in regard to the Spanish-American War veterans. There again, Mr. President, I might remark that when the Steiwer-McCarran amendment was debated on the floor of the Senate it was certainly the opinion of everybody that one difference between the Steiwer-McCarran amendment and the Byrnes amendment was that the one would be vetoed and the other would not. Again I completely absolve the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] from making any misstatement on the floor of this body; but certainly, from the debates in this House and in the other House, any Member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives was justified in voting for the lower rate, perhaps against his own personal convictions, on the ground that by doing so he would be obtaining something for the veterans and that otherwise they would obtain nothing. Yet even here many Spanish-American War veterans who cannot trace service connection will obtain relief and benefits. I am not criticizing that result; I think it is perfectly proper; but it is in violation of the principles which the President lays down.

Mr. Douglas, the present Director of the Budget, when he was running for office in Arizona at the last election, stated that under no circumstances would he ever require a Spanish-American War veteran to prove service connection. Yet, of course, that is exactly what has been done with regard to most of the veterans by acts principally sponsored by Mr. Douglas and by the Veterans' Bureau.

The President goes on to say:

It is a simple and undeniable fact that the United States, in terms of compensation and in terms of hospitalization, has done and is doing infinitely more for our veterans and their dependents than any other Government.

Mr. President, I question the relevance of that argument. Comparing the wealth of the United States with the wealth of every other government, comparing the resources, the man power, and the traditions of the United States with those of any other country, I question whether such a comparison means anything at all.

We must remember that outside of Great Britain every European country maintains a system of universal military service. From that point of view there was not any particular discrimination against any one generation. The young men of each generation had to spend certain years of their lives outside of their profession and in the military service of the state. It merely so happens that one generation was confronted with war while other generations were confronted with peace-time service. Nothing of that sort applies to the United States, where we have never had that practice and have not acted on that theory. The men whom we drafted in 1917 were subjected to handicaps to which no other generation of our time has been subjected.

Furthermore, referring to the systems under which the European governments have treated their disabled, those systems, whatever they may have been, have remained in force from the end of the war to the present time. No matter how badly the budget got out of balance, the one expenditure which England and France and Germany and the rest of them insisted on maintaining to the limit was the expenditure in favor of their disabled ex-service men. That is the principle which to my mind we violated last March and which we are certainly violating if we sustain the veto message today.

The President ended his message with eloquent words:

My disapproval of this bill is not based solely on the consideration of dollars and cents. There is a deeper consideration. You and I are concerned with the principles herein enunciated. I trust that the Congress will continue to cooperate with me in our common effort to restore general prosperity and relieve distress.

Mr. President, I think those of us who would vote for justice for the disabled veterans are just as much interested in questions of principle as is the able and distinguished President of the United States. I think we have an equal right to our views. We have already manifested those views. On the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol it has been adequately and strikingly demonstrated that the sentiment of the two Houses of Congress is in favor of justice for the disabled veterans.

Let me talk a little more about the presumption which was written into the law in 1924. Every Senator understands that when a man is smitten with tuberculosis or when his mind gives way and he is locked up in an asylum, it is in most cases impossible for him to prove the precise moment at which the seeds of his special disease first entered his system. Understanding that fact, both Houses of Congress in 1924 decided that the best way to handle the matter was to put a presumption in the law—a presumption adequately supported by medical evidence—that any man who became ill of a particular class of diseases before a certain date should be presumed to have contracted the disease in the service. There has been some criticism of that action on the ground that the presumption was in some cases un rebuttable. But that does not apply to the present legislation because in this legislation the presumption is rebuttable if the Government can show that the man contracted his disease either before or after his service. Regardless of the question of rebuttal the original provision passed both Houses of Congress in 1924 without a record vote, but after considerable debate. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], I believe, was at that time a Member of the House of Representatives which passed the provision. He certainly made no vocal objection to it.

Under that provision, from 1924 to 1933 these men, nearly all of them in the last stages of disease, unable to support themselves, unable to earn a living, were relying on the guaranty given them by their Government, as represented by a bill passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the then President of the United States, Mr. Coolidge, that they would continue to get those benefits from their Government. In 1930 there was introduced in Congress the so-called "Rankin bill", to extend the presumptive period 5 years. Mr. Hoover vetoed the bill in language which I have read. Only six Senators, all of them on this side of the aisle, agreed with Mr. Hoover's view. On the other side of the aisle Senators unanimously voted against Mr. Hoover, although they had no chance to vote to override his veto.

I have already referred to those votes and I do not want to go again into that subject. However, I do want to invite the attention of the Senate to the vote which took place in the House of Representatives on the overriding of Mr. Hoover's veto. This veto, I may state again, was merely on the extension of the presumptive period from 5 years to 10.

Among those who voted to override Mr. Hoover's veto were Mr. RAINEY, the present distinguished Speaker of the House; Mr. Garner, now our own beloved Presiding Officer; Mr. WOODRUM, who has been leading the administration fight in the House, and many other distinguished Members of the House of Representatives. I am not criticizing them for their votes. I am praising them for the splendid way in which they stood by their convictions against the wishes of the President of the United States.

But there is one other Member of the House of Representatives of that time to whose vote I desire to call particular attention. Among those who voted to override Mr. Hoover's veto, who voted to extend the presumptive period from 5 years to 10, was Mr. Douglas, of Arizona, the man who is now responsible for declaring that the 5-year presumption is, in effect, a lie; the man who has been back of the Economy Act and the regulations which were devised under that act. Mr. Douglas, of Arizona, then a Member of the House of Representatives, voted, over the President's veto, to extend the presumptive period from 5 years to 10.

How in the world can there be any consistency in the action of anybody who now comes before us and says that 5 years is too much; that we must go back to a 1-year presumption; and that we must throw out of existence these men who have been counting on their Government ever since?

Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate. I am ready to vote at any time. The Senate voted, 69 to 15, for the Steiwer-McCarran amendments, which contained, first, the higher rate for the Spanish-American War veterans; second, the reestablishment of service-connected cases of the World War at the full previous rates; third, the restoration of the presumptives; fourth, the restoration of some of the emergency officers; and, fifth, the proposal of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] cutting down our own salaries.

There is no way on God's earth in which any Senator who voted with the majority on that vote can explain now a vote to recede.

Take the question of the Spanish-American War veterans: If you voted in the minority, if you voted for the 75 percent instead of the 90 percent, then you voted to do exactly what is before us; and if you voted for the 90 percent, you voted to do more for them than is now before us.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Was it not assumed in the Senate—perhaps improperly—that the 75-percent allowance to Spanish-American War veterans, and 10-percent restoration of pay, was acceptable to the administration?

Mr. CUTTING. It was so assumed, and that assumption was expressed at great length in both Houses of Congress.

Secondly, the emergency officers: We voted for them. They have gone out of the bill. I think it was wrong to let them out of the bill. Many of the most pitiful cases that I know of are cases of emergency officers, but they are gone. No question about them is involved at the present time.

Take the restoration of the service-connected cases at the old rates: The President does not criticize that. That apparently is satisfactory to everybody.

Take the Borah amendment: I am sorry the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is absent; but I will say that surely there is not a Member of this body who would go to his constituents and say, "Oh, I voted with the majority on the Steiwer-McCarran amendment, although I objected to doing anything for the ex-service men, because I was so convinced that I must cut down my own salary that I would vote for anything, provided that were included in the bill." I do not really believe any Senator will go to his constituents on that basis; so we may leave out the Borah amendment for the moment.

There remains only the question of the presumptives. That is the question we have been discussing here ever since the Economy Act passed. Every Senator who voted with the 69 and against the 15 voted principally, to my mind, because he favored that provision, although he had been warned that a veto was impending.

Mr. President, let us not confuse the issue. Let us not attempt to argue personalities here. Let us not allow our personal affection for the great President of the United States to influence us in voting our own convictions, so often expressed by our votes on the floor of this body.

The Members of the House of Representatives undoubtedly had an equal affection for the present President with any which we may assume. They voted their convictions. For years I have sat on the floor of the Senate, and I have always felt proud to think that the Senate of the United States was the more liberal and the more independent of the two Houses of Congress. Perhaps that was an unjustifiable source of pride; but I have not yet been convinced that it was so, and I shall not be convinced so long as there is any chance that this House will do its duty along with the other House, and voice its own convictions in this matter.

One of the greatest shocks I had when I first came to the Senate was to hear a great friend of mine, the then Republican majority floor leader, who had led the fight for a certain measure which had been vetoed, stand up afterward on the floor of the Senate and say, "Of course I believe in this measure. Of course I voted for it on passage. Of course I worked for it. But the President of the United States, who belongs to my political party, has vetoed it, and, as Republican floor leader of this body, I cannot vote to override the veto of a Republican President."

It seemed to me then, Mr. President, in my innocence—I was serving my first few months here—that the majority floor leader, of all men, was the one who ought most jealously to guard the honor and the rights of his particular body. I thought that he, of all others, having led us in the fight, should not desert us on account of a difference of opinion with another coordinate branch of the Government. My convictions to that effect have never been changed from that day to this.

The President of the United States has his constitutional privilege of voicing his opinion by vetoing our legislation; we also have our rights, not only as Members of the Senate of the United States but as human beings, to voice our own personal convictions in the respect in which the Constitution of the United States entitles us to voice them. As United States Senators, I can only say that nothing has transpired since our original vote on this question which could possibly change the mind of any independent, progressive, sincere, honorable man.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Johnson	Reed
Ashurst	Couzens	Kean	Reynolds
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Davis	King	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Dickinson	La Follette	Russell
Bankhead	Dieterich	Logan	Schall

Copeland	Hayden	Pope	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, when the veto message was laid before the Senate, I announced my readiness to take an immediate vote.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] has made a forceful address urging the passage of the independent offices bill over the President's veto. The Senator from New Mexico having presented the views of those who favor the passage of the bill over the Executive veto in a very able and fair manner, it is right and proper that the primary features of the Executive standpoint as presented in his message should be discussed by some who intend to support his attitude.

One who is familiar with the subject matter of the controversy involved in this debate must recognize the fact that there are differences of opinion which cannot be, as some have sought to do, accounted for solely on the ground of sympathy or lack of sympathy for the veterans whose interests are directly involved in the dispute. There is no doubt in my mind that every Senator here has appreciation for the splendid services rendered by the soldiers of this Nation, services of such a character that they have brought honor and victory to the flag under which those soldiers fought.

Mr. President, in my judgment, it is not just, as some have attempted to do, to place the President in the attitude of not comprehending or of failing to demonstrate a sense of justice and of patriotic recognition for the gallantry, the courage, and the heroism of those who have worn our uniform during the conflicts referred to.

It is my purpose to attempt to show that there is no injustice, that there is liberality toward the veteran in the measure, and the arrangements affecting it, as contemplated by President Roosevelt. Let me first call attention to some statements made by the Senator from New Mexico which I deem unsupported in sound argument and logic. The Senator took the position, as I understood him, that it is inconsistent for anyone who voted to concur in the House amendments to refrain from voting for the resolution to pass the bill notwithstanding the President's objections.

Plainly, that argument cannot be sustained. Probably everyone who hears me who is familiar with legislative experience and precedent fully comprehends the fact that one is often called upon to choose between provisions neither of which is acceptable but one of which is less objectionable than the other. I do not believe, in view of the history of this controversy, that the conclusion can be fairly reached that those who voted to concur in the House amendments estopped themselves from voting to sustain this veto.

It will be recalled that after a prolonged and intense debate the Senate adopted a series of amendments quite different from those later incorporated by the House of Representatives; but when the bill went to the House again that body rejected the Senate amendments and proposed certain provisions which were returned to the Senate, and the vote then involved a choice between the Senate provisions and those incorporated by the House of Representatives. All that the result of that vote indicated, in fairness and justice, was a preference for the House provisions over the Senate provisions.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from New Mexico, that the House provisions more nearly conformed to what we have come to know as the Byrnes proposal than did the Senate amendments. There are some distinctions between the Byrnes proposal and the House amendments which it is necessary to keep in mind during the course of this discussion.

With respect to the restoration of salaries, I recall no distinction, but there were differences between the provisions as they related to Spanish War veterans and as they related to veterans of the World War, and I think the Senator from New Mexico pointed out the most prominent and decisive distinction; that is, in relation to presumptively connected cases.

The attitude expressed by the Chief Executive in his message involves a subject that cannot be passed over lightly. As stated by one of the great newspapers, the Baltimore Sun, it raises the question whether we are to have a "wide-open system of veterans' benefits and a wide-open program of recurrent Federal expenditures, with the sky as the limit."

Recurring to the thought that there is no intention on the part of anyone here—certainly not upon my part—to do injustice, or to deal oppressively, or in any other spirit than that of liberality and keen appreciation for the services of our veterans, let me indicate that there is a very notable distinction between the Byrnes proposal and that incorporated in the House provision. The Byrnes proposal did provide for the restoration of all presumptively connected cases to the roll, and also looked to an appeal of all the many thousands of cases that had been decided by the boards created under the President's Executive order, but it did not contemplate keeping on the rolls those who were found not to be entitled to that recognition. It did contemplate their final severance if upon full investigation it was disclosed that the injuries of which they complained were not or could not have been service connected.

It is entirely true, as stated by the Senator from New Mexico, that the practical effect of restoring to the rolls temporarily all presumptively connected cases would be that in the end it will result in many going permanently off the rolls.

There has been here, and I think there was in the address of the Senator from New Mexico, an effort to belittle the distinction between "recurring annual expenditures" and those incident to an emergency program of relief. I know it has been said by many that we have wasted a large amount in efforts to afford unemployment relief, and that having done that we ought to pursue a course toward veterans that would be not only liberal but that might itself result in some amount of waste.

Mr. President, there is not one who hears me who cannot recall the condition of this country a few months ago. We were fighting then over the question whether the resources of this great Nation should be commandeered, in a sense, for the benefit of those who were suffering from want, hunger, and cold. We had millions of deserving citizens, citizens who are equally deserving with our veterans, who were out of employment, who were unable to secure an opportunity to earn a living, who had no income, and who together with their dependents were facing suffering and despair, and it was decided to embark upon a new policy, one radically different from any that had ever before been adopted by the Federal Government, and we did make arrangements by which billions of dollars were used in giving employment, supplying food to the hungry and shelter to the needy.

It is said now that there is no distinction between an appropriation of that character and another which contemplates an expenditure annually for an indefinite period to come. And yet I think there is a distinction which ought to be and which must be kept in mind. Manifestly, if national recovery through the patriotism, the sacrifice, and the cooperation of our citizens is accomplished, if we can again look not only with hope but also with confidence "unto the hills whence cometh our help", if business in this great country is revived and earnings are restored, these emergency-relief expenditures will be discontinued.

While we ought not refuse to make a just appropriation, and to make every effort to find the means with which to meet the expenditure thus incurred in order to do justice to our veterans, we are under no obligation, either in law or in morals, to pursue a course which will fasten upon the Treasury an expenditure that is not justified and required by sound reason and logic. That is applicable to every form of expenditure.

It may be true that in the experiments to which we have all given our earnest cooperation, there have been spent sums which have not brought adequate or satisfactory returns. Nevertheless, it cannot be charged that the Executive, or that we, as Members of the Congress, have designed or intended such a course.

It is our duty, in accordance with well-recognized principles, to manage the affairs of the Government with due regard to the ability of this and of coming generations to meet the obligations which we assume or authorize or impose. There is a distinction, which every fair mind can see, between an emergency expenditure for relief and the adoption of a policy which contemplates an expenditure throughout the indefinite future.

So that the subject, as I see it, is whether the plan proposed by the Executive is a fair one, whether it meets the ends and the aims of justice.

The Senator from New Mexico criticized the declaration in the veto message referring to military service in defense of the country as "a basic obligation of the citizen." I have understood from the beginning of my study of public questions that every citizen who has the strength and the courage is expected to yield his service to his country when it is imperilled. Therefore it seems to me that the term "basic obligation" is not unfair and not unjust, and I do not believe there can be just criticism made of the principles announced by the President, namely, that inevitably from the obligation of the citizens to bear arms, is the obligation and responsibility of the Government toward those who suffer injury or contract disease while serving in its defense.

Nor do I believe that the second principle announced in the message so severely criticized by the Senator from New Mexico is subject to the criticism which he expressed.

One who went to a concentration camp, who performed other duties in preparation for service at the front, is not to be discriminated against; but at the same time he has no right to a privilege or to a recognition which is not accorded to every other citizen who performed his duty, even though the other citizen did not wear a uniform. He is not to be condemned because he did not have the opportunity of making a great sacrifice or of experiencing danger in combat; but, at the same time, merely because he volunteered or was drafted and wore a uniform does not put him in a separate class above the citizen who stood behind the lines and gave of his services with equal courage and with equal hope and with equal patriotism to the support of our ranks in the trenches or as they advanced across no man's land in the face of streams of liquid fire and poisonous gas.

The Senator from New Mexico states, by implication, that once a veteran's name is placed on the rolls, since it ought not to be placed there unless it is justly placed there, there ought not to be any question as to the permanency of the name on the rolls; but we all know that there have been numerous instances in which names have been placed on the rolls that were not justly placed there. We know the circumstances, in some instances, in which that has been done. It is entirely true that the removal of such cases from the rolls ought not to justify or to permit the removal of one whose name was rightly and properly placed there; but the determination of the question of service origin, as stated by the President, is a question of fact rather than a question of law; and in spite of all that has been said in criticism of the action of the boards, in spite of the assertions that there have been discriminations and differences in the manner in which the boards have functioned in various localities, it is a fact that the way in which the boards were constituted was a fair way, and that they were expected to function fairly and justly, and that the membership on the boards of ex-veterans or men who had served in the Army cannot be alleged as a discrimination against the veterans or as a demonstration of partiality against their interests.

The fact of the matter is that the object of the arrangement as made was to make certain that in every case—in every individual case—justice would be done. The fact that $117,000,000 has been added to the annual cost of the Veterans' Administration since the Economy Act was passed, and the regulations under it were first adopted, is, to my mind, some evidence, of the desire and fixed purpose of the Chief Executive to do justice in every case where the issue of injustice had been raised. The fact that, through Executive order and modification of the regulations, the annual expenditure has been increased from $486,000,000 to $603,000,000 is, in my judgment, an evidence of the efforts to do justice to the veterans.

I think the Senate will credit me with accuracy of statement when I say that, realizing from the beginning the difficulties that inhere in this problem, the conflicts of opinion which were bound to arise, it had been my hope and purpose to assist in working out an arrangement, a compromise, if you please, that might be acceptable to all who are concerned, and I regret that it has not been possible to do that. But, in the expansion of relief by the restoration to the rolls, pending decision on appeal, of all presumptively connected cases, by the restoration to the rolls of 75 percent of the Spanish-American War veterans removed from the rolls, the President has shown a desire and a disposition to work this question out justly and without unfairness or oppression to any veteran.

Mr. President, I know it is possible to say that there ought not to be any question of money raised when subjects of this character are under discussion; but if a service pension is to be recognized as a sound way of dealing with this subject, we may expect, as stated by the President, that on this ground alone—that is, on account of the service pension to World War veterans alone—by 1949 we will be expending $830,000,000. Some consideration ought to be given to the Budget. There is a difference between an annual and a recurring expenditure and one that is of an emergency nature, since the last, we may hope, may be suspended or discontinued and since the first is expected to be perpetuated or continued indefinitely. I believe that the principles upon which the President has based his veto are deserving of recognition and of study by every Senator who hears me.

I know it has been said that having once voted for the passage of a bill, a Member of the House or of the Senate estops himself against taking a contrary view after a veto has been sent down by the Chief Executive; but, plainly, that contention has no force under the Constitution. The Constitution does not provide that if two thirds of the Senators and two thirds of the Representatives shall vote for a measure it shall become law. It provides that if a majority, whether a mere majority or practically the whole Membership of the two bodies, shall pass a measure it shall go to the President in order that he may express his views upon the subject and in order that the two legislative bodies may have the advice and counsel with which his opinion provides them. No other conclusion can be reached; and it is not a breach of good faith, it is not a repudiation of honor, for one to vote for a bill and when it shall be vetoed to vote to sustain the veto. The real question is what is just, what is right, and what is fair. I am entirely willing that every Senator respond to his judgment and to his convictions; but I do not think it is fair to say that having once placed yourselves in opposition to the Chief Executive, for whatever reason, you shall not under any circumstances take into consideration the recommendation he makes or the rule he suggests relative to the legislation which is the subject matter of controversy.

The object of a veto is to give the two Houses the judgment of the Executive, who is a part of the law-making power. Under our Constitution no bill can become a law unless it shall be signed by the President or passed by a two-thirds vote over his veto. Daily here we pass measures by unanimous consent, sometimes by bare majorities, sometimes by an overwhelming majority, and is there anyone here who would insist that by reason of the course taken in the enactment of legislation we are estopped from taking that counsel and that judgment which, on its face and by reason of the logic and argument that underlie it, the Executive's opinion is entitled to?

I know there are some here who are going to be happy if the Senate shall override the Executive veto, happy not alone because their position will prevail but also because of the fact that, in a measure, it will discredit the Chief Executive. I know there are some who will not have that object and that purpose in mind. All that I am appealing for is that the Senate shall give to the Executive veto the weight and force to which it is entitled; that it shall give to him that fair treatment and that fair measure of cooperation to which by reason of his great services he is entitled. When that shall have been done, I shall have no complaint.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement made by the very able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who enjoys the distinction of being the floor leader of the majority in this body and the prestige of being the spokesman here for the Chief Executive. I was interested particularly in what was said near the end of his statement to the effect that some Members of this body might be happy to vote to override the President's veto.

I do not know whether or not that is true; but if it be true, I am not surprised. The President has embarrassed Members of this body many times in connection with veterans' legislation. Implied promises at least have been held out to Members of this body many times that if something less than was proposed by the good judgment of the body be done with reference to the veterans the President would support it. Those accredited with speaking for the Chief Executive have held out such hopes to Members on the other side of the Chamber more than once. In connection with this very measure statements were made by accredited administration leaders on the other side of the aisle indicating very strongly that if this plan were adopted the Chief Executive would sign the bill. Now it develops that the bill is vetoed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I tried to point out in my remarks that that was not the case. There were distinctions which I tried to make clear.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; the Senator made the distinction. That is quite right. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the motion to concur in the House amendments and the House plan was made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who, as every Senator in this Chamber believes, speaks for the President. When the Senator from South Carolina made that motion, every Senator had a right to believe he spoke for the President and that the President would sign the bill if the Senate would concur in the House plan. That deceived many Members of this body. So I do not wonder, under the circumstances, deceived as many Members of this body must have believed themselves to have been, that they would be happy now to show their constituents that they meant no harm toward the veterans of the United States.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I have just returned to the Chamber, and I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that in no statement I have made on the floor of the Senate at any time have I quoted the President as expressing any approval of this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Those of us who serve here regularly understand what it means when certain Members say certain things. [Laughter.] The Senator from South Carolina made certain statements which caused other Members of this body to believe that he was speaking for the President. When he made his motion to concur in the House amendments many Senators voted with him who believed in the Senate's more liberal treatment of the veterans and the Government employees; but, lured into the belief that the House plan would be accepted by the White House, especially after the Senator from South Carolina made the motion, they voted to go along, now only to be struck in the face by the Chief Executive himself with this veto that cannot possibly hold water.

Mr. BYRNES and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will yield first to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I am going to vote with the Senator from Indiana, but I do not look upon the President's veto as being a slap in the face at all. The great leader of our party for a number of years, William Jennings Bryan, discussed that matter, and I want to read to the Senator what he said with regard to a Presidential veto. It is not to be regarded as a slap in the face by the President, nor is our overriding of his veto to be so regarded. Said Bryan:

The President of the United States, in the discharge of his duty as he sees it, has sent to Congress a message calling attention to the present financial situation, and recommending the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law as the only means of securing immediate relief. Some outside of the Hall have insisted that the President's recommendation imposes upon Democratic Members an obligation, as it were, to carry out his wishes, and overzealous friends have even suggested that opposition to his views might subject the hardy dissenter to administrative displeasure. They do the President great injustice who presume that he would forget for a moment the independence of the two branches of Congress. He would not be worthy of our admiration or even respect if he demanded a homage which would violate the primary principles of free representative government.

That is what Mr. William Jennings Bryan said in 1893. That is the basis upon which we here who exercise our representative prerogatives will vote to pass this bill over the President's veto.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield now to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I asked the Senator again to yield to me only to express the hope that he would be fair enough in his statement to say, if he knows the fact, and if he does not know the fact I want to advise him, that before the vote was taken on the original proposal as to the pay cut I advised the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that it was my proposal made after consulting only two members of the subcommittee. I made the same statement to the general committee the following morning. Before the vote was taken upon the floor of the Senate I again made that statement. Before the vote was taken upon the motion to concur I again stated that I did not approve of the House amendment, but regarded it as the least objectionable of the two proposals.

On my own motion and without any authority to quote or seek to bind anybody else, as one of the managers on the part of the Senate, I moved that concurrence. I must not be deprived of my right to act; and when I do act, there must not be written into any statement I make the belief that I am quoting anybody else or acting for anybody else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, no, Mr. President; I believe the Senator has never said on the floor of the Senate, "I am now speaking for the President of the United States", but all of us had every reason to believe, from all that had been stated and all that had been written on the subject, that the Senator from South Carolina enjoyed the very close confidence of the President and that what he said reflected the views of the President.

I am not alone in that view. The distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] yesterday on the floor of the Senate made practically the same statement. I do not remember that he mentioned the name of the Senator from South Carolina, but he did say that statements had been made, as I have said, indicating that the President would accept the House plan, so that the Senator from Missouri evidently was as badly confused on the subject as some others have been.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. As I said a little while ago, I completely absolve the Senator from South Carolina from making any statement which could be subject to criticism on the floor of the Senate. I repeat that at the present time. Nevertheless, it was of course assumed by most Members of this body that the lesser relief offered by the Senator from South Carolina would be favorably received elsewhere; and when the debate took place on the floor of the House, the gentleman who introduced an identical amendment with that offered by the Senator from South Carolina spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is the amendment offered by Senator JAMES BYRNES, of South Carolina, in the Senate. The general feeling is that the President will not accept the Senate amendment to this bill as it applies to veterans. Therefore, if we are going to get anything at all for the veterans it will be necessary to effect a compromise.

Senator BYRNES was recognized as the administration spokesman on veterans' legislation when this measure was pending in the Senate. Whether or not he had any agreement with the President I do not know. So far as I know he did not so state on the floor of the Senate. But the fact that he offered an amendment restoring Spanish War veterans and their widows to the rolls, giving them 75 percent of the amount they were receiving a year ago, clearly indicates to me that he had a feeling that the President would accept that amendment.

And again, later on in the debate of March 14, 1934, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] used this language:

I used in part the entire language of the amendment offered by Senator JAMES BYRNES, of South Carolina, who was looked upon as the President's spokesman in the Senate. Senator BYRNES will be one of the Senate conferees, and as such my amendment, which originated with him, will probably be acceptable to him.

Of course, any statement of that kind does not bind the Senator from South Carolina in any way; but, in view of what the Senator is saying, I do think it is pertinent to the general argument, because undoubtedly a great many Members of both bodies voted for the lesser degree of benefits with that understanding.

I hope that is a fair statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator from New Mexico for his observations.

Mr. President, one other statement was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to which I desire briefly to refer. I have not his exact words, but they were to the effect that he resented anybody's attempting to place the President in the attitude of not appreciating the valor of the soldiers during the war.

In that connection, Mr. President, I can only rejoin that the President of the United States has placed himself in that attitude. He has done far more to cause the people of this country to believe that he does not properly appreciate the valor and the gallantry of those who have offered their lives in defense of the country than any feeble words could do that might be uttered on this floor, not only by his own deeds but by his words.

I heard the President make that remarkable speech in Chicago at the national convention of the American Legion, when he said in substance, "No man is entitled to anything just because he wore a uniform." Substantially the Senator from Arkansas repeats the same dictum here this afternoon. Says the Senator from Arkansas, substantially: "The man who goes into a concentration camp, who is there for a little while, is entitled to no special consideration on that account. Just because he wore a uniform he is not entitled to any more consideration than the civilian back of the lines who never wore a uniform but did what he could."

I say to the Senator from Arkansas and to the President of the United States that all of us honor the citizen who with patriotic fervor supports the Government in time of war; but I say at the same time that the citizen's liberties would all be gone were it not for the warrior at the front and for those who must condition themselves to go to the front.

I say to the Senator from Arkansas, we did not talk that way in the days of 1917 and 1918, when the country's life was imperiled. When nations go to war, they fight to the death, and one or the other will be victorious. One may destroy the other, Mr. President, and when one nation is victorious over another, then the vanquished country is invariably invaded by the conquering forces.

I point out to the Senator from Arkansas and to the Chief Executive of the United States that when the army of the conquering nation invades the country of the vanquished, it is the women and children first who suffer; and the warrior stands out there between the enemy and that fate, worse than death, to come to the women and children of the country, and offers his life in their defense. He is the despised man in uniform the Senator talks about so glibly here this afternoon.

Not only that, but if the conquering nation sees fit to do so, it may make slaves and vassals out of the men as well as the women and children of the vanquished country. So the warrior out there, the despised man wearing the uniform who today is the forgotten man, stands between the sovereign citizen in this country and possible slavery when he bares his breast to the enemy who would enslave him.

So much for the 2,000,000 who were on the other side of the seas during the World War, doing their best to prevent the enemy from invading our shores in one way or another. Now let me say a word for the 2,000,000 back here who were in the concentration camps, being conditioned to go over there.

Not all the casualties in warfare come from the front-line trenches, Mr. President—not by any manner of means. There are thousands of casualties flowing out of the training camps, brought about, as is inevitable, where thousands of men are herded together like animals. There are disease epidemics, epidemics of influenza, weakened lungs, thousands of cases out of these camps from which the victims never can hope to recover in this world. There are the rigors of military discipline that youths just out of comfortable homes are entirely unaccustomed to face, to say nothing of the mental strain in these days of poison gas, and tremendous engines for the mass destruction of human beings—men blown to atoms on the other side over there, so that there were no means of identification except for the dog tag worn around their necks before they were blown to pieces that might be located.

The reports of men annihilated over there came back into the camps where these youngsters were, merely boys, anywhere from 18 to 25 years of age. Many of them had been in splendid positions, receiving as much as $250, or, in one case I knew personally, $400 a month. They were consigned to these camps, placed there at a dollar a day, while their comrades on the other side of the seas were actually stopping bullets, living in mud and slime for a dollar a day. While such reports were coming back from the other side of the seas, these lads were there in these camps, knowing that their careers were probably gone. Many of them had come out of the high schools and colleges, never to return. They knew while they were there that the Government of the United States was placing them there to fatten them up, to muscle them up, so that they could go over on the other side tomorrow and be shot at, and receive a dollar a day for facing destruction; yet the Senator from Arkansas says they are entitled to no consideration whatever. So says the President of the United States. I heard him say it, in substance, at the national convention of the American Legion in Chicago.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McAdoo in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator, though I should like soon to conclude.

Mr. SCHALL. The Senator says that the service men got only a dollar a day over there. I understand that they got about $6.60 a month after paying for their insurance, and the bonds that were forced on them, and all that; that they drew down about 20 cents a day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Even less than that; they had scarcely enough left to buy cigarettes and tobacco after they got through paying for Liberty bonds, the allotments back home, and so forth. They bought bonds just the same as the man back of the lines here in this country. They had a lot of things to do that ran all the way from buying bonds and supporting their folks at home up to facing death, the while they were living in mud and slime. Yet the Senator from Arkansas says they are entitled to no special consideration. So also says the President of the United States on the eve of his journey down to Florida to rejoin the Economy League on the palatial Astor yacht, the Nourmahal.

From the Economy League and Mr. Astor's yacht, the Nourmahal, came the President a year ago with his infamous so-called "Economy Act." Back, after a year, returns the President after practically seeing the veterans treated like dogs. After a year of that kind of treatment, with a veto safely behind him, he returns to the palatial Nourmahal, Mr. Astor's yacht, to the Economy League, in whose arms he will receive a warm embrace.

Mr. President, if the President is in this sort of an attitude before the country, he has placed himself there. "By their fruits ye shall know them." These are his own deeds. I do not wonder that Members, particularly on the other side, are anxious to show the veterans back home and throughout the land that they have not forgotten them.

Ah, we may have to enlist soldiers tomorrow, and no one need be surprised if we do. The clouds of war hang low throughout the world this afternoon, Mr. President. Europe is an armed camp, to use an expression which has become trite, but which nevertheless is true. Out in the Far East, where our interests cluster, there, too, 9,000 miles from home, we may need soldiers, sailors, and marines. Then the despised man, who wears the uniform, will be much in demand. But I warn you, do not make these soldiers too unpopular, do not make it despicable for one to wear the uniform. By your action here show that you regard the valor of the American soldier for the deeds of glory he has performed on a thousand gory battlefields. Do not treat him like a dog. The youngsters coming on tomorrow may have to carry muskets, and they will not carry them with much patriotic fervor if they believe they are to be treated when they return as this Congress and this administration have during the past 12 months treated the veterans of the United States in three great wars—the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the World War.

Mr. President, let me say a word—and I must hasten—about the message itself and the reasons assigned for vetoing this very reasonable bill. I say "reasonable" from the standpoint of the administration's attitude. It is not reasonable in any degree to the veterans. The Senate provisions would have come much nearer doing justice by them, and the Senate amendments did not go nearly far enough. Only by repealing the entire Economy Act, so-called, root and branch, every line of it, can substantial justice be done to the veterans of the United States and their families.

Even then you cannot do justice, for you cannot bring back from the other world those who have been slain by this infamous thing we call a law, and those who, looking through the glass ever so darkly, seeing no hope in the future, have taken their own lives. You cannot bring them back.

Mr. President, I want to read from the message. This has to do with both Government employees and the veterans. Says the veto message:

Furthermore, the Budget submitted by me to the Congress on January 4, 1934, laid down a definite program of expenditures and a definite estimate of receipts.

I hope somebody saw that definite program that was laid down so definitely and that definite estimate of receipts about which the President speaks. I never saw it. If there is anything definite in any of the Budget messages which have come here since the President has come into office, I have never seen or been able to distinguish that definiteness.

Because of the emergency expenditures for relief and unemployment, the expected total deficits this year and in 1935 are necessarily large.

There was not a word of that kind, however, when it was demanded that we pass the infamous so-called "Economy Act." Then we were told it would balance the Budget; but 3 days later we passed a law taking care of 250,000 to 350,000 able-bodied young men, from 18 to 25 years of age, in C.C.C. camps, which cost more than all the saving, twice as much from the Treasury as all the saving made by victimizing the veterans and their families. And that continues to this day, and the President asks for its continuance on and on, though it is costing, I suppose, as much as a billion dollars a year. It contributes little to the unemployment situation, but it does do this: It places these able-bodied lads, if they get a little sick, in the hospitals built by a grateful people for the veterans of the Nation, places them on beds in these hospitals from which disabled veterans have been driven as if they were entitled to no consideration. Go out to Walter Reed Hospital and see the situation. According to the last figures I had—and I quote from memory—something like this is correct; some 6 or 8 veterans are there, the despised men who wore the uniform, but there are hundreds of the tree planters in the beds the disabled veterans had previously occupied.

Not only that, but if one of these lads dies and leaves a widow, we pay her $45 a month pension, while the poor old deceased veteran's widow and his orphans must hold a hat for charity as they go begging through the streets of our cities, so far down in the scale has gone the despised man "who only wore a uniform", to quote the language of the floor leader on the other side of the Chamber.

Says the President—and mark this:

This bill exceeds the estimates submitted by me in the sum of $228,000,000.

My God! Has the President of the United States completely discredited the intelligence of the American people? This bill would exceed his estimate for the Budget $228,000,000, when he just got through telling the Congress and the country, within the last 3 months, that we face a deficit of over $7,000,000,000 next July. Where is there any consistency in a statement like that? God save the mark! He just told us and the country that the national indebtedness would be in the neighborhood of $32,000,000,000, and suggested no method for paying it, excepting to turn the printing presses loose and print the money, and not even that suggestion; he makes no suggestion; one can only assume it. But, at the same time, and in the same breath, he tells us to be ready for a $7,000,000,000 deficit. In other words, the Budget, within 12 months after he was inaugurated, will be more than $7,000,000,000 out of balance, the deficit will be that much; and having just told us that, now he says, "I can do nothing for the veterans or the Government workers, because it would throw my estimates out $228,000,000", which is not a fourth of a billion dollars; yet the President himself, in an orgy of expenditures such as the world has never seen, has literally thrown out to everybody who asks for it, during the past year, more than $10,000,000,000. But the despised man, whose only fault is that he responded to his country's call and wore a uniform—ah, he must not have anything, nor must the Government worker. It would throw the President's estimate out of balance!

Of course, it is all right, says the President, for the business man to throw his estimates out of balance, to put on additional employees, to pay them additional salaries; not only not to decrease salaries but to raise salaries. All of us are in accord with that. If the plan can be made to work, we should like to see it done to absorb the unemployment. But, at the same time, the President says, in effect, with reference to the Federal workers, "They do not come under the N.R.A. They are different. They are almost in a class with the despised man who wore the uniform. We must keep their salaries and their pay reduced, grind them down under the heel to the lowest possible figure."

Consistency? The Senator says the President ought not to be placed in a false attitude. God knows he has placed himself in this attitude, and the country now understands that attitude. Certainly the veterans do, and the Federal workers do, for they have been victimized by this policy of inconsistency which has developed throughout the year. The President says in effect, "Of course this would throw out of balance my estimates by $228,000,000. But just to show you that I do not care how much they are out, if I do it, I am this day directing that 29,000 of these cases be placed back on the rolls."

In other words, if the legislature does it, if Congress enacts legislation that will cost approximately $200,000,000 over estimates, that is all wrong, it cannot be handled; but in the same breath and in the same message the President substantially says, "I, myself, have today put these 29,000 presumptive cases back on the rolls."

Why did he do that on the day he sent his veto message here? True, he says he is going to have them reviewed; and if they are not right, he will throw them off again. That is just exactly what some of us want to avoid. We want to restore the vested rights of these veterans, so that no man, if he feels out of sorts in the morning, can take it out on a disabled soldier of the World War or of the Spanish-American War or of the Civil War. We want the law to stand back of the veterans and the Federal workers. We do not want to leave them to the tender mercies of either the Chief Executive or of any of his bureaucrats. We want the vested rights of the veterans restored. That is why we want to place 29,000 back on the rolls where they belong, and place the law solidly behind them.

Mr. President, the Executive made that statement yesterday. Could that have been a bait, could that have been a lure to gain votes in the House and in this body? Why did the President put these 29,000 back just yesterday? Why did he not do it the day before or a week ago? Is it not incontestable that the President felt that public opinion in this country was rapidly growing to the point where the people would stand no further abuse being inflicted on these men who had worn the uniform, and that, in order to keep from being reversed in the other House and here, he felt he had to place them back as a matter of elemental justice?

Then, again, he says he has placed some Spanish-American War veterans back. He says:

I am today directing the restoration to the rolls of those Spanish-American War veterans who in 1920 were receiving pensions as a result of having sustained an injury or incurred a disease arising out of their war service.

Why yesterday, Mr. President? Why would he do that yesterday? That is the question that arises. Was it a bait, perhaps, to lure the legislative branch of the Government away from a just plan, one that would be fair and equitable?

One other thing, Mr. President, and then I am through with the message. There seems nothing further to talk about in it. This is a statement I challenge. This is the language of the President:

It is a simple and undeniable fact that the United States, in terms of compensation and in terms of hospitalization, has done and is doing infinitely more for our veterans and their dependents than any other government.

I deny that statement. Within the last 12 months I placed in the RECORD a table, and I will see that it is again recorded, in order that everyone may be familiar with it, showing that when a comparison is made with respect to population and wealth per capita this Nation has treated its veterans less generously than either Great Britain, France, or Germany. That is in the RECORD. The statement of the President, therefore, must be challenged and thoroughly denied. Even in the days of our best treatment of the veterans, we were not as generous with them as any of the nations I have just named.

Mr. President, so much for that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I have just been checking over the vote in the House of Representatives; and of the Democrats who voted, over 2 to 1 voted to override the President's veto. From what I understand in the Senate it is not regarded as a party matter at all on either side of the aisle, nor is it regarded that there is any effort to keep this matter from being a straight-out economic matter, to be settled on the basis of each individual Senator's and Representative's conscience.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes, Mr. President; but let me say this: There should not be one scintilla of partisanship in this question. So far as I am personally concerned, there is not a whisper of partisanship in this question. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to visitors occupying the galleries that any manifestations of approval or disapproval are entirely out of order and will not be permitted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I stood on this floor a year ago with 12 other Members of this body, some on the other side of the aisle and some on this side of the aisle, and I watched the great majority of the Members on the other side of the aisle vote for the infamous thing that is called the "Economy Act", against the veterans of the United States, and I saw the great majority of the Members on this side of the aisle vote for that same infamous thing. There was no politics in it then. It seemed to be unpopular. At any rate, a great majority of the Members of this body thought it was unpopular. They felt it was so unpopular that they refused to join me in trying to get justice for the veterans of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I come to this point. There still is no politics or partisanship in this question. So far as I am concerned I do not care whether the veterans who are disabled in their country's service are Democrats or Republicans. I am simply fighting as best I know how, that they may all get a square deal from the Government they served and for which they offered their lives. There is no politics in it. It should be too sacred for politics. There should be no one playing politics on a question of this kind.

Mr. President, we have the acid test here. Either we are for these veterans or we are against them. This is probably the last chance we shall have to vote on this question during the present session. Here is the acid test. If we shall vote to override the veto we will vote to befriend the men who wore the uniform—so characterized by the senior Senator from Arkansas. If we shall vote to sustain the veto we will vote against the veterans.

In conclusion let me place in the RECORD something that came to my desk this morning from the National Tribune, dated Thursday, March 29, 1934. It is under the caption "New Kind of Education." I wish to read a little of it.

The desperate fight against the veterans by the National Economy League apparently has sapped its finances. An organization which pays $15,000 a year for its director and collects no dues must need plenty of money from outside sources.

To refill its coffers, the league, through E. R. Harriman, chairman of the finance committee, is making an appeal for funds. As all of its battles have been fought in behalf of the boys with the dough bags, naturally the appeal is being made to them.

That is the boys with the dough bags.

The sole purpose of the league has been to penalize disabled veterans and their dependents so that the wealthy might be able to cut down their income taxes.

Mr. Harriman is adroit enough not to forget this fact, and as a postscript to his solicitation he added:

Listen. That is a postscript in this letter soliciting funds to carry on the nefarious work against the veterans by the National Economy League, so-called:

Contributions to the league are deductible from the Federal and State income tax.

That is the postscript. He did not want it forgotten by the boys with the dough bags, as they are called here, who might want to contribute to this nefarious purpose, so he added:

Contributions to the league are deductible from the Federal and State income tax.

Just why such contributions should be deductible from income tax it was difficult to understand until inquiry was made at the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury answered as follows:

"As the organization (National Economy League) was found to be educational in character."

Get that—

At last we know for what purpose the National Economy League was formed. It is to educate. Of course, there are all kinds of education, and to date the National Economy League has only attempted to teach Congress and the Government in general that disabled veterans, the widows, and little children orphaned by war should be deprived of their just rights so that the income taxes of the ultrarich might be kept at a low level.

Such education meets with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury so thoroughly he permits contributions to the league to be deducted the same as offerings to churches and charitable organizations.

The action of the league in urging that veterans unable to earn a living due to disabilities be pauperized comes under the head of education.

Under the Treasury's definition it is educational to promulgate the idea that homes should be broken up and little children forced into orphans' homes where they cannot receive a mother's loving care.

If we understand the Secretary's ruling correctly, education embraces the theory of throwing disabled men out of homes where they have lived for years even though there is plenty of room in those homes to care for the outcasts. It must also be educational to deprive men desperately in need of hospitalization of such treatment although beds, doctors, and nurses are available.

Such is education as fostered by the National Economy League by means of false and vicious propaganda. Not one single constructive idea looking toward true economy in government—Federal, State, or municipal—has been advanced by the league since it was organized as a tool of big business. Its sole purpose, to judge by its acts, has been to promote the theory that the rich should not be taxed.

And now the league asks for more funds to carry on its nefarious work, promising contributors income-tax deductions as an inducement to subscribe.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire article may be incorporated in the RECORD immediately at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me repeat, Mr. President, as I resume my seat. Have a care, have a care how far you go toward making the American warrior, the veteran of the wars, the soldier, the sailor, and the marine, unpopular. Before the dawning of a new day you may be at war. When you are at war, then you must call on the despised man who wears the uniform.

The article presented by Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana and ordered to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

[From the National Tribune, Thursday, Mar. 29, 1934]

NEW KIND OF EDUCATION

The desperate fight against the veterans by the National Economy League apparently has sapped its finances. An organization which pays $15,000 a year for its director and collects no dues must need plenty of money from outside sources.

To refill its coffers the league, through E. R. Harriman, chairman of the finance committee, is making an appeal for funds. As all of its battles have been fought in behalf of the boys with the doughbags, naturally the appeal is being made to them. The sole purpose of the league has been to penalize disabled veterans and their dependents so that the wealthy might be able to cut down on their income taxes.

Mr. Harriman is adroit enough not to forget this fact, and as a postscript to his solicitation he added:

"Contributions to the league are deductible from the Federal and State income tax."

Just why such contributions should be deductible from income tax it was difficult to understand until inquiry was made at the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury answered as follows:

"As the organization (National Economy League) was found to be educational in character * * *"

At last we know for what purpose the National Economy League was formed. It is to educate. Of course, there are all kinds of education, and to date the National Economy League has only attempted to teach Congress and the Government in general that disabled veterans, the widows, and little children orphaned by war should be deprived of their just rights so that the income taxes of the untried might be kept at a low level.

Such education meets with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury so thoroughly he permits contributions to the league to be deducted the same as offerings to churches and charitable organizations.

The action of the league in urging that veterans unable to earn a living, due to disabilities, be pauperized comes under the head of education.

Under the Treasury's definition it is educational to promulgate the idea that homes should be broken up and little children forced into orphan's homes where they cannot receive a mother's loving care.

If we understand the Secretary's ruling correctly, education embraces the theory of throwing disabled men out of homes where they have lived for years, even though there is plenty of room in those homes to care for the outcasts. It must also be educational to deprive men desperately in need of hospitalization of such treatment, although beds, doctors, and nurses are available.

Such is education as fostered by the National Economy League by means of false and vicious propaganda. Not one single constructive idea looking toward true economy in government—Federal, State, or municipal—has been advanced by the league since it was organized as a tool of "big business." Its sole purpose, to judge by its acts, has been to promote the theory that the rich should not be taxed.

And now the league asks for more funds to carry on its nefarious work, promising contributors income-tax deductions as an inducement to subscribe.

This is to be expected from the National Economy League, but the action of the Government in becoming a party to the crime is inexcusable. Under the Treasury ruling any two or three persons can join together, take out corporation papers, declare the organization "to be educational in character", and go out and mulct the people.

Webster defines education as follows: "The impartation or acquisition of knowledge, skill, or discipline of character." Under no stretch of the imagination can it be said that the National Economy League's policy fits in with this definition of the word.

The fact that Congress has shown a tendency to relent in its stand toward the disabled veterans has made the league desperate, and to renew its unfair and undercover fight it appeals to the Treasury of the United States for aid.

And gets it!

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have no desire to inject myself into this discussion and would not have done so had it not have been for the character of speech just made by the Senator from Indiana. "Have a care lest we have another war!" Mr. President, it is just such language as the Senator from Indiana employs; it is just such tactics as he displays; it is just such votes in 99 percent of the cases as he casts here that precipitate wars and make for the unrest of the world. If he has ever done anything to promote a peace or add to the tranquillity of the American people since he came to the United States Senate, I do not know when it was. He has made speech after speech against every plan that might preserve peace and prevent war. If anyone wishes to have him more enthusiastic than he is about veterans, all that it is necessary to do is to get him on the subject of a big navy, because he is for that, too. As bad as have been his speeches in this body heretofore in arousing prejudice and in trying to dethrone reason, the one he has just delivered is the worst he has ever uttered. "The soldier gets nothing! He is a despised man! This Government has done less for the soldier than have France and Germany and Italy." Those were the remarks of the Senator. If they were not, I ask him to rise now and deny them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Those were my remarks, and they were taken literally out of the mouth of the majority leader of the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the Senator wants to put the responsibility on somebody else. [Laughter.] I am now putting it on the Senator. He cannot mislead the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No; I say to the Senator now that the soldier, under this administration, is the forgotten man.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Furthermore, what has the Senator from Mississippi ever done for either war or peace during all the years he has been here? I have watched him closely.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I refuse to yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will state his point of order.

Mr. LONG. I make the point of order that the only means by which the speaker may be interrupted, since there seems to be a desire for a barbecue fight here, is for the Senator desiring to interrupt first to address the Chair, and ask the Senator if he will yield. That rule should be adhered to. The Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Indiana—

Mr. HARRISON. I refuse to yield.

Mr. LONG. Seem anxious to make the Senate an arena with a bullfighter on each side.

Mr. HARRISON. I refuse to yield.

Mr. President, as to the question whether or not this Government has done anything for the soldier, and as to whether the soldier is a despised man, let me say there is not a Senator within the sound of my voice but knows that this Government wants to deal fairly and justly with the American soldier. We may differ as to how far we ought to go; we may differ as to the wisdom of our policies in the past respecting the soldiers; but I say that we have been just toward the American soldier, and, while all of us would desire to do more, the Government has been quite generous. Here is the utterance of the President on this problem:

What you and I are seeking is justice and fairness in the individual case. I call your specific attention to the fact that since the original regulations were established a year ago actual experience has shown many cases where these regulations required modification. I have not hesitated to take the necessary action and have issued regulations which have made many changes. These changes, based on principles of justice to the individual veteran, involve additional expenditures of approximately $117,000,000. It goes without saying that I shall not hesitate to make further changes if the principles of justice demand them.

The Senator from Indiana is speaking of the "despised man." Who doubts that the President of the United States is seeking to do justice by the veterans in each individual case? Does he not state in his message that "it goes without saying that I shall not hesitate to make further changes if the principles of justice demand them"? Who on this side of the aisle doubts that? Does not the whole record of the President dissipate any doubt as to what he will do?

And the Senator from Indiana says that this Government has done less for the veterans than have France, Germany, Italy, or Great Britain. How misleading! How incorrect!

Let me give you the figures for 1932, the latest available year.

The facts are that Germany, with a mobilization of men in the great World War of 13,000,000 and with killed and wounded more than 6,000,000, disbursed to her war beneficiaries $298,000,000. France, with a mobilization of 8,410,000 and killed and wounded more than five and one half million, provided $286,000,000. Great Britain, with a mobilization of 6,600,000 and with 3,000,000 killed and wounded, provided $174,000,000. Italy, with 5,615,000 mobilized men and with killed and wounded more than one and one half million, expended to its war beneficiaries that year only $69,000,000. The United States, with a mobilization of less than 5,000,000 men and with killed and wounded slightly more than 300,000, expended $860,000,000 in 1932.

In this connection I submit for the RECORD a table showing a comparison of expenditures of the United States with those of foreign countries for World War veterans.

	Men mobilized	Dead and wounded	This year's relief bill	Per capita based on men mobilized	Per capita based on dead and wounded
United States.....	4,757,240	322,497	$860,635,000	$180.91	$2,668.66
Germany.....	13,000,000	6,111,862	298,690,000	22.98	48.87
France.....	8,410,000	5,623,000	286,722,000	34.09	50.99
Great Britain.....	6,600,000	3,000,000	174,802,060	26.49	58.27
Italy.....	5,615,000	1,597,000	69,853,300	12.44	43.74
Canada.....	619,636	232,045	61,123,000	98.64	263.41
Total for foreign countries.....	34,244,636	16,563,907	891,190,360	26.02	53.80

In the face of those facts can anyone say that the veteran of this country is a "despised man"? These facts show that we have been quite generous to our ex-service men. Perhaps we have not done what we should have done, but I submit that no one can say upon the floor of this Senate, and get away with it, that this Government has treated her ex-service men as "despised men." The Senator from Indiana, with his usual grace and vehemence, tried to arouse the other side to solidarity. But I saw many Senators over there hang their heads in shame at his remarks. I know they do not sanction them; I know they are not in sympathy with that character of speech. He called attention to the fact that last year, the President, just before making his recommendation on economy legislation, had taken a trip to Florida, had gone out upon a yacht, and that now he was out of the city again, on the water, perhaps, upon the same yacht. I so understood the Senator's expression, whereby he tried to arouse the prejudice not only of the soldiers but of the Senate, and to criticize the President of the United States not only for sending his message here but also for not being in Washington at this time, and for taking a few days' rest down in the southern clime. There is no other Senator here who would resort to that kind of speech in order to get votes. If ever in the history of the White House a President was entitled to rest from continuous and arduous labors, it is President Roosevelt. I suppose that no other Senator begrudges the President's leave of absence—and certainly few persons can be found in this country with the audacity to attempt to make political capital of it.

Let us remember that the Senator says it is not a party question. Of course, it ought not to be a party question.

Legislation touching the World War veterans has never been a party question. It is unfortunate that a Republican caucus was held respecting this question. It is a pity that it should be made a party question. I hope that there may be some division on the other side of the aisle, so that it may be shown that it is not a party question, despite the fact that it looks very much as if some would attempt to make it such.

The President of the United States, Mr. President, has done a good job. The Senator from Indiana may criticize him on occasion after occasion, find fault with all his recommendations, and vote against practically everything he suggests, and the Senator may receive the plaudits of some ex-service men for his action; but throughout the length and breadth of this land there are ex-service men who do not approve the Senator's course nor his utterances. It is my opinion that those men who went to the colors, who defended the flag, and preserved this country and civilization, want to see this Government preserved and the country sustained above any compensation that they might receive from the Treasury of the United States.

I have faith in President Roosevelt. The American people have confidence in him. Already he has modified regulation after regulation to take care of countless cases. Only yesterday he put 29,000 presumptive cases upon the rolls with pay and gave instructions to the Veterans' Administration that the burden of proof was upon the Government to show that they are not rightfully there.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I prefer not to yield, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. Did the Senator from Mississippi ever attend a hearing before the Veterans' Bureau under the present system and, if he did, did he observe the travesty that prevails there?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I have attended some of the hearings in the Veterans' Administration, and I have been greatly disappointed in some of the hearings I have witnessed before some of the boards.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very grateful to have the Senator make that admission.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, that is quite true; I felt very much aggrieved about it. I thought that in several cases the Veterans' Administration was wrong. But now the President of the United States has given instructions for a reformation in that regard. He has appointed local boards in every State throughout the country. In my State my colleague and I selected ex-service men to serve on those boards.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, would the Senator care to yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to finish pretty soon.

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to be discourteous to any Senator. I am going to finish in a moment, and I am sure that I am not now saying anything with which anyone can find fault, for I am stating facts.

Mr. CUTTING. I am sure the Senator does not mean to misstate the facts.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I do not mean to do so.

Mr. CUTTING. And it is for that reason that I ask leave to interrupt the Senator. There is nothing in the suggestion made by the President, I will say to the Senator, which in any way alters the regulation, promulgated under the Economy Act, under which the boards have acted up to the present time.

Mr. HARRISON. He has appointed the new boards, however, to go over the presumptive cases.

Mr. CUTTING. New boards, yes; but there is no new method for determining service connection different from what was provided under the old law.

Mr. HARRISON. But new boards have been created and the Appeal Board here has been enlarged to receive and consider the appeals from the local boards. And instructions have gone forth that every reasonable doubt be resolved in favor of the ex-service man.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. In response to what the Senator from New Mexico has said, may I say that the Executive order, a copy of which I have in my hand, provides, unlike the old regulations, that in the consideration of the appeal cases the boards shall in their decisions resolve all reasonable doubt in favor of veterans, the burden of proof in such cases being on the Government.

Mr. CUTTING. That is nothing new. That was in the old regulations.

Mr. HARRISON. The President has appointed these boards in the States to go over the presumptive cases and in most instances ex-service men compose the boards. Appeals can be taken to the new Board of Appeals that is composed in large part of ex-service men. The President has given instructions that he wants the burden of proof assumed by the Government. He is trying to do the right thing. He said he would try to meet the individual cases by modification of regulations as they arise.

I have confidence in my President. I am not going to say by voting to override his veto that I do not believe he will do the right thing, and it is inconceivable to me that a majority of Senators on this side of the aisle should pursue any such course as that.

In concluding his message the President used these words:

You and I are concerned with the principles herein enunciated. I trust that the Congress will continue to cooperate with me in our common effort to restore general prosperity and relieve distress.

Was there ever a man in the White House who has sacrificed more in order to revive confidence and restore prosperity? Has any man consecrated himself and his talents more diligently and more earnestly than he in order to bring about a better condition in the country? I say it to the credit of the Republican Party that they have in the main cooperated.

Those of us on this side of the aisle tried to do the same thing when President Hoover was in the White House. I frequently criticized President Hoover politically, but from the time the black night came over this country and we got into the bog of economic despair I stood here and helped to sustain every constructive measure that he proposed, whether it was imposing additional taxes, whether it was trying to secure authority for organization of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or whatnot. We laid aside politics and tried to fight together in order that we might restore confidence and bring a return to prosperity. Even the distinguished leader on this side of the aisle received some criticism because of an expression that he made in cooperation with other Democratic leaders that we would pull together with the Republicans until we could get the country back to normalcy.

The President has done a good job; but whenever the country gets the idea that the men in his own party have deserted him and are not willing to cooperate and uphold his hands and that he has lost his grip upon Congress, his whole recovery program may be endangered. For my part I have gone along with his leadership because I believe he is making an honest and a successful effort to bring back normal conditions in the country. We may have made some mistakes. We may have enacted some legislation that does not agree with my philosophy of government. But we are not yet out of our economic trouble, and we will get nowhere if we divide and fight among ourselves. We criticized the last administration for failure in cooperation and lack of program. We promised cooperation and a program. Let us keep that promise.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, before I allude to the subject which I want to present I feel it my duty to make brief reference to a colloquy in the debate between the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

In the discussion between those two Senators the Senator from South Carolina asserted, with respect to the pay-cut amendment which he had offered, that it was his own idea and that he had offered it without consultation with the President. It is my recollection that his statement is entirely correct. I speak of it only because he also referred to a statement which he had made in subcommittee and before the full Committee on Appropriations. It is my recollection that upon those occasions he stated that the pay-cut proposal was his own suggestion, that he hoped the President would approve it, but that he had no assurance to that effect.

As I remember, the only one of the various proposals offered by the Senator from South Carolina which we were given to understand had the informal approval of the President was the amendment which he offered in behalf of the veterans of the War with Spain. In order to make perfectly certain the exact statement made at that time I will ask the Senate to indulge me while I read briefly from the Record what the Senator from South Carolina then said:

I do not know what the President told other Members of the Senate; I simply wish to say, in order that there may be no doubt and in order that the record may be straight, that I described to him my compromise proposal to pay to the Spanish-American War veterans 75 percent of what they had received prior to the enactment of the economy law, restoring to the rolls all who were included in the amendment which I presented to the Senate upon yesterday and providing they could be paid only when in need. I estimated to the President that that amendment would cost approximately $42,000,000. Thereafter, in conference with some members of the committee who have been sympathetic with the program of the administration, I drafted the amendment. When completed I was advised that it would cost approximately $50,000,000.

The amendment as drawn was never submitted to the President by me. I have no reason for saying that the final draft, which was completed only a few moments before the Senate met yesterday, would meet with the President's approval, other than his statement to me some days previous that he would approve 75 percent with a suitable-need clause. I wanted to make this statement in view of what has been said.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I should like to call also to the attention of the Senator what was said on February 27 with regard to the same amendment by the Democratic floor leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]:

As stated by other Senators this morning during the course of the debate—

Said the Senator from Arkansas—

the proposal submitted by the Senator from South Carolina was the result of much consideration, not only on the part of members of the Appropriation Committee, but also on the part of representatives of the administration, including the President himself.

And the Senator from Arkansas went on to say, after some other remarks:

The plan carried in the several amendments of the Senator from South Carolina in my humble judgment represents approximately the maximum of what may be actually accomplished in legislation under present conditions. If the Steiwer-McCarran amendment remains in the bill, more than probably it will encounter an Executive veto.

I think any Member of the Senate, after hearing that language, could draw only one conclusion; namely, that in the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, at least, the Byrnes amendment, as distinguished from the Steiwer-McCarran amendment, would not compel a veto.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has the floor.

Mr. LONG. Is that a quotation from the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Mr. LONG. The Senator means the leader on this side of the Chamber?

Mr. CUTTING. Exactly.

Mr. LONG. I wish the Senator would read that again. My attention was distracted during the reading, and I should like to hear it again.

Mr. CUTTING. I dislike to read it over again, but I shall be glad to do it for the Senator's information:

The plan carried in the several amendments of the Senator from South Carolina in my humble judgment represents approximately the maximum of what may be actually accomplished in legislation under present conditions. If the Steiwer-McCarran amendment remains in the bill, more than probably it will encounter an Executive veto.

The bill as it stands today, as the Senator from Oregon well knows, embodies substantially the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. As a matter of fact, my understanding is that the so-called "Taber amendment" adopted by the House, and concurred in by the Senate the other day on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, really involves an expenditure of some $13,000,000 less than the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina himself.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEIWER. I am not sure of the figures, Mr. President; but I do know, from my own analysis of the so-called "Taber amendment" agreed to in the House, that it is less inclusive, covers less veterans, and will cost less money than the proposal made here by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. President, I am not going to urge any species of estoppel against the right of any Senator to vote his convictions. I rather agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] with respect to the right of a Senator in dealing with a problem of this kind.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President—

Mr. STEIWER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, of course, there is never any difference between the Senator from Oregon and myself as to facts.

Mr. STEIWER. There may be before the day is over.

Mr. BYRNES. No; not as to facts. As to opinions, there may be; but there will be no difference between us as to facts. The Senator from Oregon would not agree to the statement of the Senator from New Mexico that there is no difference between the Taber amendment as to presumptives and the amendment which I offered as to presumptives.

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, no, Mr. President; and I think the Senator from New Mexico was referring only to what had been said just before with respect to the Spanish War veterans.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I was quoting the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who referred specifically to the amendment on Spanish-American War disabilities.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that statement is not accurate. I referred to the amendment as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and had in mind at least especially the subject of presumptive cases.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I hate to differ with the Senator from Arkansas. I apologize to the Senator from Oregon for taking up his time; but the Senator from Arkansas has accused me of inaccuracy, and, therefore, I desire to quote exactly what he said:

Passing then to the second Steiwer-McCarran amendment, on yesterday an amendment proposing to restore 90 percent of the compensation awarded Spanish War veterans prior to March 1933, prevailed over an amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], which reenacted the pension laws with relation to classes of veterans other than World War veterans on the basis of 75 percent.

As stated by other Senators this morning during the course of the debate, the proposal submitted by the Senator from South Carolina was the result of much consideration not only on the part of members of the Appropriations Committee but also on the part of representatives of the administration, including the President himself.

I submit it is perfectly clear what the Senator from Arkansas was talking about.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was talking about the basis of 75 percent for Spanish War veterans.

Mr. CUTTING. Which is what we have under the present bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; one feature.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not want to decline to yield, but I hope Senators will permit me to proceed with the subject which I wish to present to the Senate.

I am in full accord with the general principle laid down here by the majority leader. He stated, in effect, that he was entirely willing for every Senator to vote his convictions, his conscientious judgment, with respect to this veto message. I concur in that. I regret that there is ever anything that even hints in the direction of partisanship when the legislative branch of the Government is considering the care of disabled and sick veterans of our wars. I approve the Senator's temperate and just statement with regard to the views of Members of Congress upon a subject of this kind.

I am not in agreement with the Senator upon his conclusions; but, as he said, there are two schools of thought, or at least there is more than one viewpoint upon this matter. His happens to be different from the viewpoint which I desire to present; but I hope I can present it in the same spirit which he employed.

Mr. President, I am brought to the place where I feel it to be my duty to make some reference to the veto message. As one of the authors of the amendments which were adopted in the Senate, and which later were replaced by the amended provisions of the House of Representatives, possibly I have a certain degree of responsibility in the premises.

In discussing the veto message of the President, and in keeping with the spirit of the address made a little while ago by the Senator from Arkansas, and in the hope that I may discuss it without partisanship, or even the appearance of partisanship, I find myself confronted with a very difficult problem. I desire to say to Senators, however, that I shall not purposely criticize the President. In referring to the veto message, I refer to the message itself. I hope to deal with it as an abstraction, if I may, and then to reach such conclusions concerning it as the facts seem to justify.

A message from the President of the United States deserves the respectful consideration of all Members of this body. There is, however—and I think it will be conceded by all in the Chamber—no justification for the acceptance of an Executive viewpoint unless that viewpoint is a sound viewpoint.

Even upon the basis of a rather superficial examination of the message, I am forced to the conclusion that the President has been led into rather serious errors. With respect to those errors, I most respectfully call to the attention of the Senate some statements that have been made over the President's signature.

I read from the message the following statement:

It is true that very large but wholly distinct funds are being dispensed daily for emergency purposes, but these funds are going directly to the purpose of saving farms, saving homes, and giving relief and employment to millions of our fellow citizens. They are nonrecurring in nature, while the increases contemplated in this bill are continuous and permanent.

Mr. President, some part of the increases included in the bill are continuous and permanent. Others are not continuous and are not permanent. There will be cases in which the pension will cease upon the death of the veteran, and other cases in which the compensation will be substantially reduced in amount in the event that the veteran is hospitalized.

Passing by these considerations, a more serious error is involved in the statement that the large expenditures of today are being dispensed for emergency purposes.

The bill before the Senate applies to the fiscal year 1935, and for that year Congress has already authorized expenditures and has appropriated funds far in excess of Budget estimates both for emergency and for nonemergency purposes.

Let me review briefly some of these expenditures. I have made notes of some of them to which I desire to refer.

Public, 84 continues the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It increases the indebtedness of the country actually or potentially $850,000,000. The proceeds of this indebtedness will, we all believe, be used for useful purposes; but they will not, in the language of the veto message, go—

Directly to the purpose of saving farms, saving homes, and giving relief and employment to millions of our fellow citizens.

Public, 97 provides crop-production loans to farmers. It carries an appropriation of $40,000,000.

The Vinson naval bill authorizes expenditures of $475,000,000. Under its authority we may, within very reasonable possibility, expend as much as $95,000,000 a year for the 5 years beginning in 1935.

House bill 7478, the bill to include cattle as a basic commodity, as passed by the Senate and House, but I think not yet signed by the President, appropriates the magnificent sum of $200,000,000, of which $150,000,000 may be returned to the Treasury from future processing taxes.

House bill 8471 is the War Department appropriation bill. This bill has passed both House and Senate but is not yet finally enacted. The Senate, with very meager debate, increased the appropriations for numerous military and non-military activities in a total amount of $73,650,000. This amount, together with all the other items to which I have referred, are in excess of Budget estimates. The total increase over Budget estimates, not counting matters which are strictly of emergency character, aggregates hundreds of millions of dollars. One of the items excluded is the enormous emergency appropriation of $950,000,000 provided by Public, No. 93. This great item is not included, because it is clearly of an emergency nature.

Moreover, many of them are continuous in character, and others, which are not permanent, must in the very nature of things be supplemented in future appropriation bills. The attempt to distinguish between the permanent character of pension appropriations and the like character of appropriations for the maintenance of the Army and the Navy and other regular establishments of the Government cannot be sustained in the substantial sense in which the distinction is urged by the President in his message.

On page 2 of the message the following statement is found:

This bill increases the compensation for employees of the United States Government $125,000,000 over my Budget estimate for this purpose.

At another point in the same page we find the following statement:

In submitting the Budget estimates last December I recommended compensation restoration of 5 percent for the next fiscal year.

These statements, of course, relate to the pay cuts of the employees of the Government.

I regret that I feel it my duty to make a further point with respect to these statements. Apparently the message contains a plain misstatement of fact.

The bill to which the veto applies does not effect full restoration of employees' compensation. In language which admits of no misunderstanding it effects the restoration of 5 percent effective February 1 and the restoration of an additional 5 percent effective July 1.

These facts are known to us all. The first 5-percent restoration—that is, the restoration between now and July 1—was not provided for in the Budget estimate. There is no controversy about that. The additional 5 percent provided for the fiscal year 1935 was not provided for in the Budget estimate. The first 5-percent restoration for the year 1935, moreover, was recommended by the President, as stated by him in his message.

So far as the year 1935 is concerned, the action taken by the Congress exceeds the Budget estimate and the recommendation which the President himself made by 5 percent, and no more. The amount of this 5-percent increase is not $125,000,000; it is approximately $63,000,000. Evidently this portion of the veto message was written with respect to the bill as it passed the Senate. If it related to that bill the statement would be true, but when applied to the bill as passed and as modified in the House of Representatives, it is approximately $63,000,000 in error. History will, no doubt, record the statement as both inaccurate and unfortunate.

This error, in fact, should be read in connection with the further statement in the message that the bill exceeds the estimates submitted by the President in the sum of $228,000,000. This figure apparently is also in error. It can only be supported by calculating the pay increase at $126,000,000 instead of the correct figure of $63,000,000. Moreover, it would appear that the $228,000,000 includes $21,000,000, which was added to the bill in the Senate Committee on Appropriations, but this increase was made in order to supply the funds to pay benefits created by the President's Executive order of January 19, 1934. On the President's imputation that Congress is at fault in adding this $21,000,000, I make no comment.

These considerations suggest an examination of a statement in the latter part of the message. The President refers to certain changes which he has made in veterans' regulations, and then states:

These changes, based on principles of justice to the individual veteran, involve additional expenditures of $117,000,000.

In the last sentence of the paragraph he repeats the idea in the following language:

Since that time, by Executive order, the addition of $117,000,000 increases to $603,000,000, the total cost of veterans' relief for the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. President, I am not quarreling with the figure used by the President, namely, the increase of $117,000,000. That is the figure which has been furnished me by the Veterans' Administration. I think without question it is a correct figure. But the figure of $117,000,000 is arrived at by including the following items: $50,000,000 of estimated benefits restored by Executive order of June 6, 1933; $46,000,000 of estimated benefits restored by Public, No. 78, passed June 16, 1933; and $21,000,000 estimated benefits restored by Executive order of January 19, 1934. Thus it would seem that the President's assertion that the $117,000,000 has been restored by Executive order is only partially true. An estimated total of $71,000,000 was restored by Executive order.

The President complains that Congress, in increasing expenditures, "has failed at the same time to provide a similar sum by additional taxation." I call attention to this statement because it seems to me that it is not a fair criticism, and that no consideration should be given to it by those of us who are considering whether or not we should vote to support the veto or should vote to pass the bill notwithstanding the veto of the President. It must be remembered that the House of Representatives, in its consideration of this bill, brought out a resolution which effectively prevented the House of Representatives from making any amendment to the bill. It was stated publicly, on the floor of the House, that this resolution was requested by the President, and the House accordingly gagged itself in order to follow his leadership.

The amendments restoring pay and providing increased compensation for veterans were first adopted in the Senate. Of course, the Senate could not "at the same time provide a similar sum by additional taxation." A revenue bill must originate in the House, and the House cannot act in this behalf when it is bound by rule prohibiting amendments. I do not claim that Congress would in any event have added any such provisions, but the fact remains that the President pursued a course which guaranteed against the inclusion of any revenue provisions. I say it is not fair when the only person in the world who could have effectuated such a guaranty is also the only one who complains that the revenue provisions were not included in the bill.

Mr. President, before I leave the subject of the costs added by the action of Congress, let me present to the Senate for the thoughtful consideration of all those who want to arrive at the truth of this matter the figures which, I believe sincerely, truly reflect the added cost occasioned by the enactment of this law.

As I stated a little while ago, for the fiscal year 1935 the only item of pay cut that is over and above the Budget estimate is one item of 5 percent, amounting to $63,000,000.

I have an estimate of the Veterans' Administration that the provision carried in this bill for the Spanish War veterans will cost approximately $37,500,000.

I have another estimate of the Veterans' Administration, that the only two provisions of the bill which will include any cost so far as World War veterans are concerned, namely, sections 27 and 28, will cost approximately $41,800,000 a year.

There are no other provisions in the bill which create any substantial amount of cost. The hospitalization provision, which is one of the three points included in the Legion's four-point program, is estimated by the Veterans' Administration to cost nothing, because the President has already substantially placed it in effect, and the two provisions which will cost money are sections 27 and 28, and as to them the cost will be $41,800,000 a year, as stated. The total cost created by this bill is something like $142,300,000 per year and cannot be $228,000,000.

Moreover, in the message of the President there are three very interesting references to the regulations which the President proposes to make, or which he has already made, extending benefits to certain service-connected Spanish-American War veterans, restoring to the rolls temporarily and subject to review, other Spanish War veterans, and restoring to the rolls, also subject to review, 29,000 of the presumptive class.

According to the estimates submitted by the Veterans' Administration, if these groups are left upon the roll for as much as 1 year, the total cost under these regulations will be $60,800,000. I invite the attention of all Senators to that figure. If they are left on for 1 year, the total cost will be in excess of $60,000,000. Therefore, the difference in cost per year between what Congress is proposing to do if it passes the bill and what the President proposes to do if he has not already done it, is the difference between $142,300,000 and $60,800,000. The difference is a little over $81,000,000 and not $228,000,000.

These figures were provided in the main by the Veterans' Administration itself. Certainly they are not too low. They may be too high. But, allowing for error, the undeniable fact remains that the difference between what the Congress proposes by this legislation and what the President has done or is doing for the fiscal year 1935 is only a little over $80,000,000.

A Senator from the floor suggests that of that amount $63,000,000 is occasioned by restoration of pay to civilian employees, and with respect to that we must bear in mind if there is a sharp upturn in prices the law already provides the mode by which the Executive would restore the pay of the civilian employees. So it is impossible to say with absolute assurance that even the figure which I have used would be maintained up to the end of the year. It may, indeed, result in a very much smaller figure and a very much smaller difference than the $81,500,000.

Mr. President, I want to refer a little further to the President's message. In the President's discussion in the message of the provisions relating to veterans he speaks of principle and quotes from his address to the American Legion in Chicago. I read a part of his quotation, which is as follows:

The second principle is that no person, because he wore a uniform, must thereafter be placed in a special class of beneficiaries over and above all other citizens. The fact of wearing a uniform does not mean that he can demand and receive from his Government a benefit which no other citizen receives. It does not mean that because a person served in the defense of his country, performed a basic obligation of citizenship, he should receive a pension from his Government because of a disability incurred after his service had terminated and not connected with that service.

Mr. President, I do not share the critical views of some of my colleagues, with respect to that utterance by the President. I think, if correctly applied, I can accept it substantially as he stated it there. Yet there are many factors involved in this situation which some of us have been prone to overlook, and I invite Senators' attention to some of them.

In the first place, it would appear, and I say this with all respect to the President, that the President has reserved the right to violate this principle as a sort of personal prerogative of the Chief Executive. Let me tell the Senate why I make that statement.

In the regulations of March 31, 1934, he provided payments of $20 per month for veterans permanently and totally disabled from diseases that were nonservice connected in their character. On June 6, in supplemental regulations which were issued by the President, he increased this payment to $30 per month for the same character of disability, that is to say, for non-service-connected disabilities if they were permanent and total.

On January 19 of this year he issued the regulations I referred to a little while ago, and at that time he provided that hospitalization was to be furnished to certain veterans whose disabilities were not related to their military service.

It was stated in the Senate by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in the debate on March 27, that the President had agreed to the restoration, under certain conditions, of the veterans of the Spanish-American War on a basis of 75 percent of their former pay. That is the statement that I alluded to and read earlier in this debate. In this great group of war veterans more than 96 percent have been unable to trace their disabilities to the military service.

Then there is another class: There is a great group who are beneficiaries under the special pension laws. They are the omnibus pension laws that every Congressman and every Senator knows. We see one of them in almost every session of the Congress.

The veterans receiving the special pensions in nearly all cases suffer from disabilities that cannot be traced to their military service. In many cases they have the opportunity, under one law or another, to trace disability to the military service, but the facts deny them that connection. They are unable so to trace their disabilities. Yet in the Economy Act these pensioners suffered no reduction at all. Subsequently they were placed by Public Law No. 73 on the same basis as the civilian employees of the United States Government; that is to say, they were given temporarily a 15-percent cut.

If now the President's veto is sustained, these non-service-connected cases will not only be recognized by the law but they will be automatically restored to 100 percent of their former amount commencing with the next fiscal year.

Mr. President, that makes, I think, four recognized groups of non-service-connected cases which the President himself has recognized, and to which benefits are being paid in accordance with the regulations which the President has issued. It would seem, therefore, that the President himself does not recognize any principle of denying pensions in proper cases, even though the man who wore the uniform cannot trace his disability to his war service. But even if the so-called "principle" is, in fact, recognized by the President and by the Congress as a principle in our Government, it has but little, if any, application to the pending bill.

I was rather surprised when I heard the statement read in the message, and was brought to realize that the President was urging the so-called "principle" as an argument against some part of the bill. It would apply with greatest effect to the Spanish War veterans, but as to those veterans the President has already indicated to the Senator from South Carolina that he is reconciled to the idea of restoring them to the rolls upon the same basis on which they are restored by the pending bill. The bill provides hospitalization in certain cases, as I said awhile ago, but the hospitalization provision is almost identically in accord with that which the President himself made by regulation.

Outside of these provisions; that is, the provisions with respect to the Spanish War veterans whose disabilities in most cases are nonservice in character, and outside of the hospitalization provisions, there is no basis for the application of the so-called "principle" except to that group of 29,000 presumptives concerning whom we have heard a great deal during this debate. Evidently the President in his message is referring to them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator state what is the average payment that was received by these 29,000 veterans?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the average payment of all veterans prior to the Economy Act, I think, was $43 plus; but it is my understanding that in certain diseases, namely, tuberculosis and the neuropsychiatric diseases, the average of the payment was somewhat above the average of payment to all veterans. I cannot state the figure. The Senator may know it.

Mr. WALSH. So it is the Senator's opinion that most of the veterans with whom we are dealing in presumptive cases are veterans who are seriously sick, suffering from neuropsychiatric or tubercular diseases? Is that his judgment?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH. And does it not follow that if the Federal Government refuses to take care of them, either the local or the State government will have to take care of them?

Mr. STEIWER. Of course, that is true, Mr. President. It has already been proven in many parts of the West, where I am most familiar with the situation, and it is made especially clear when we examine General Hines' testimony given before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. What I am trying to evoke from the Senator is that we are not dealing with men who have 10-, 15-, 20-, or 30-percent disability, but we are dealing with men who are seriously incapacitated and suffering, many of them, from derangements of the mind and of the body so they are unable to take care of themselves.

Mr. STEIWER. That is very true. On reflection, I think that before the Economy Act the average payment for the neuropsychiatric and tubercular cases was fifty-four dollars and some cents, which would indicate that the veterans so classified were more than 50-percent disabled on the average.

There is a very revealing table in the record. I think this table in and of itself ought to convince Senators of a duty and invoke in them a desire to pass this bill. In this table presented to the Appropriations Committee by General Hines, there is a classification of the diseases of these 29,000 presumptives who are not now on the rolls, and it is disclosed that of that great group 10,900 are tubercular and 15,378 are neuropsychiatric cases.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that, in all probability, most of the 15,000 are confined in institutions, being unable to take care of themselves?

Mr. STEIWER. Many thousands of them are. I have inquired as to that, but have not been able to get the exact figure from the Veterans' Administration. However, many thousands of the 15,000 are actually confined in institutions, either Federal, State, or private. We know that their average disability is more than 50 percent, and that they range on the one side from fairly slight disabilities, neurotic in character, over to the other side where the veteran is absolutely demented and wholly beyond any hope of self-help either now or at any time in the future. It is this pathetic group, this ghastly group, Mr. President, of 29,000, of whom 90 percent are either tubercular or neuropsychiatric, that ought to appeal to us, and it is for them that we ought to pass this bill, because it is inevitable, if their cases shall be thrown back to the boards, that these helpless men will not be able to secure justice.

I do not attribute fault to the President; I do not feel it is because the President is against them, as has been suggested here by some. It is the nature and character of their disease; it is the trouble from which they suffer; it is their lack of capacity to look after themselves. The record shows that when their cases were brought before the reviewing board they could not go there; the old, musty files were opened up; in many cases there was no one to represent them. In other cases there were guardianships, and in thousands of cases those guardians were trust companies, and the guardians and the trust officers did not know anything about the veterans' law; they did not know how to present the cases of these men. So it was that this group of 29,000 men were left helpless and without governmental aid. I think it is wrong to put them back to the mercy of any board, and that Congress owes it to itself and to the country to restore these men to the rolls.

Mr. WALSH. And, Mr. President, to add to what the Senator has stated, these men were receiving through congressional action compensation up to very recently, and in the midst of the depression, with their relatives down and out, without any money, they are left helpless. Is not that a fact?

Mr. STEIWER. That is true. Mr. President, let me make a further statement: By regulation the President has provided that when a veteran is hospitalized he does not draw his full compensation but if his disability is service connected he draws only $15 per month. In this bill to which the two Houses have agreed we have protected our Government's interest in respect to that regulation; we recognize it.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, if the presumptives who are in institutions shall be returned to the rolls, they will not receive the percentage of the compensation which they would receive if they were not in institutions, but their compensation will be cut to $15 per month?

Mr. STEIWER. That is true, in accordance with the regulation.

Mr. WALSH. So that a good many of them will get only $15?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; but if they are hospitalized, I have no objection to their compensation being cut to $15. The thing that is essential in their lives is hospitalization and care.

Not only that, Mr. President, but we carefully guarded what we consider to be the fair rights of our Government in respect to these cases. We not only provided that the regulation respecting hospitalization should be continued but, by the action of the House, the so-called "misconduct cases" are excluded from the benefit of this proposed law. Not only that, but we exclude from its benefits all those who had attached themselves to the rolls by fraud or through mistake; and beside that, Mr. President, we have provided in effect that the Government may rebut the presumption.

We have provided if the Government can show that the disease or disability from which the veteran suffers was incurred before or after his military service, and was not aggravated by his military service, that he shall not enjoy the benefits of the restoration created by this proposed act. I cannot, in my humble view of this matter, imagine a proposal that could be more fair and just to the Government than the one to which the Congress has agreed.

I do not know what influences have been brought to bear upon the President; I regret that he wrote the message he did write; but I do know that in the message which he has submitted to us he has made no reference at all to the numerous limitations and exceptions which we have written into the law; but he has treated the question as if all these 29,000, as a body, were to be restored to the rolls.

Mr. President, I want to make this further suggestion with respect to these presumptives: Compensation in these cases was not granted merely—and I revert to the language of the President in his Chicago address—because the veteran wore the uniform, nor was it granted because he is in a special class of beneficiaries who were to be treated as superior to other citizens. They were not granted compensation merely because they had served their country, nor were they granted compensation for disability not connected with their service. I hope Senators will bear that in mind. They are presumptive cases, it is true, but the presumption is that their disability was, in fact, connected with their service. Compensation was paid because the law recognized that in certain types of diseases medical science could not trace the origin of the disease.

I do not want to enlarge upon that. The Senator from New Mexico very ably covered it today and other Senators have referred to it upon other occasions, and, in the consideration of the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, some Members of this body gave this subject very careful and critical examination. The significant thing is that the law extended these veterans the benefit of a statutory presumption, because it was impossible for the veterans and for medical science to prove the exact inception of the disease.

The presumptions were rebuttable in all cases, I think, except two. They were not rebuttable in the tubercular cases and in the spinal meningitis cases, if my memory is correct. They were rebuttable with respect to all other diseases. The majority of the 29,000 that have been placed on the rolls have been placed there in face of the right of the Government to rebut the presumption that the disability originated in the military service.

Now I refer to the exceptions which are provided in the proposed law and which give to the Veterans' Administration a further right at this time in restoring these veterans to the rolls, which is substantially equivalent to a further right of rebuttal.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTTING. Before the Senator leaves the question of the presumptives, I wonder if it has occurred to the Senator that in many cases these men deserve better treatment at the hands of their Government than the directly connected cases, because sometimes these were the men who refused to go to the hospital when they were ill, and therefore failed to obtain a record in the files; and that in many cases these men who became ill and were confined to hospitals or asylums later on in life have made it, through their own courage, impossible for themselves now to obtain positive proof of direct service connection.

Mr. STEIWER. There are such cases, but I do not know that I subscribe to the view, speaking in general, that their moral claim upon the Government is greater than the moral claim of the battle-scarred claimants who have been able to prove that they suffered injury on the field of battle.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not make it as a general claim, but I know of many cases where that is a fact.

Mr. STEIWER. There are such cases, and it may also truthfully be said, passing by the question of who has the greater moral claim upon the Government, that these veterans are even more helpless than the battle-scarred veterans, because these veterans can often rehabilitate themselves. A veteran who has lost a limb may walk very bravely through life on his artificial leg and is able often to maintain himself; he recovers his courage and lives a fairly normal life, and, compared with other class of veterans, he is infinitely better off than are they.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was hoping we could get a vote on this question. I have been interested in the Senator's speech and in his other speeches. I was hoping we might have some agreement to vote on this question at 5 o'clock or so this evening.

Mr. STEIWER. I will conclude very shortly, and the Senator may then present his idea. I think it is necessary, before I accommodate the Senator from Louisiana, that I refer briefly to the boards which have been created. We know what the alternative is. If we sustain the veto of the President, this great group of 29,000 veterans will be thrown back upon the mercy of these boards.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I know, is perfectly sincere in his statement. He said he believed that the boards are fair and that this procedure is a fair procedure. On that proposition I dissent with all the vigor I possess. We know that the review by the special boards was not fair; I do not attack the boards as such; I think most of them were composed of honest men who are endeavoring to do the right thing; but some of the boards were assembled upon 1 or 2 days' notice, others were assembled on as little as a week's notice; they were furnished with complicated regulations and with laws which those of us who have given considerable attention to the subject still do not thoroughly understand. I talked to two members of the board who admitted that they did not understand the regulations under which they were acting. Then they were called upon to make speed; they were called upon to limit the number of personal appearances of the various veterans before the boards, and then they had to deal with the 15,000 neuropsychiatric cases. They faced a situation that was utterly impossible; and because it was impossible, the result was unsatisfactory.

We heard the Senator from Massachusetts say earlier in the debate today that he talked to a member of a board who said they had connected 40 percent of the cases; and, in his judgment, had the evidence been available, they would have connected the whole 500, with some two or three exceptions.

I have been in touch with some of the members of the board. There is a general feeling that the results were unsatisfactory. It is general among the service officers of the veterans' organizations, among the field secretaries, and those who represented many veterans before the boards. Everywhere there is condemnation of the boards. Senators know what the experience has been in their own States. We know, moreover, that these boards service-connected in some jurisdictions as low as 21 percent of the veterans who appeared before them, while in other jurisdictions they service-connected as high as 74 percent of the veterans who appeared before them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot speak generally, but in one case I happen to know of, the board connected some 65 or 70 percent, and the Veterans' Administration proceeded immediately to supplant that board with another board.

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; they have done that. They have changed members of the boards. When they found boards were connecting too small a percentage the Veterans' Administration sent agents to the field. When they found that certain boards were connecting too large a percentage, they sent field agents to them. It is obvious that they did point out to the members of the boards that they were not arriving at just the kind of conclusions they ought to reach with respect to these cases.

In addition to that, after the boards had reported the Veterans' Administration authorized their agents to appeal in many cases; they appealed them to the central Board. The President by his regulations now directs that all cases be appealed and brought to the central Board. That makes it necessary for me to speak briefly about the central Board.

Before I do that, however, I want to read from the testimony of Mr. Hayes, national commander of the American Legion, who appeared before the Senate Appropriations Committee and discussed the boards I am considering at this time.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Those boards were absolutely under the domination and control of the Veterans' Administration, were they not?

Mr. STEIWER. I would not say that.

Mr. HATFIELD. But they were influenced?

Mr. STEIWER. On each board of five men there were two professional Veterans' Bureau agents, doctors, or lawyers. There were three laymen from the outside. In the very nature of the thing the two experienced men would exercise a greater influence than the three inexperienced men. I do not want to say they were under the control of the Veterans' Administration. I believe they were trying to do the right thing.

Mr. HATFIELD. But the Senator will admit that they were greatly influenced because of the knowledge possessed by the representatives of the Veterans' Administration on the boards.

Mr. STEIWER. I do. I thank the Senator for his interruption, but I would rather not develop that subject any further.

Let me read what Mr. Hayes said in referring to these boards:

Mr. HAYES. The objection is that men sat on those boards having received, 2 days before they started to attempt to determine judicially very technical questions, specific instructions which most of them will frankly admit to you they did not completely understand; and that after they had gone into their deliberations and had considered cases—and I say this without venom—they received instructions that they must speed up their work, and that they should cut down on the number of personal appearances before those boards. I could present to you instance after instance of men who asked to be allowed to appear personally before the boards, who, by reason of error or because of haste, were not given that opportunity. So we are honestly convinced, without disparaging the boards at all, that thousands of these cases are cases which, given adequate consideration—the kind of fairness and consideration that any gentleman within the range of my voice would give anyone—would have remained service connected.

There is much more of the same kind of material in the hearings, but I shall not refer to it.

Having had an unsatisfactory result from the special review boards, we are told that the appeal board can do justice. The appeal board originally consisted of 15 members. It is now increased to 18 members. I invite Senators' attention to that fact. The board originally was divided into 5 bodies of 3 men each. It is now divided into 6 bodies of 3 men each. If each group of 3 members would determine 5 cases per day, their total achievement would be 30 cases per day, and that is more than many authorities think they can deal with adequately. But if they determine 30 cases per day, 29,000 cases would take almost a thousand days. There is nothing in the record that has been made since March 20, 1933, to indicate that this length of time would be consumed. If we send these crippled and sick 29,000 presumptives to the appeal board, nobody knows what finally will be the result of the review.

Mr. President, I wish I had the power to make an effective appeal on behalf of these men. The interests of the Government will not be sacrificed by the passage of this bill. The costs, though substantial, are not excessive. The men who will be restored to the rolls in the main will be men who ought to be restored to the rolls. Substantial justice will be done. More than that, we will guarantee against the hardships and injustices that inevitably will come if we renounce our responsibility to these veterans and send them back to the boards. I am most certain, Mr. President, that that is a true statement, and that we will come nearer to providing justice, both to the Government of the United States and the veterans, if we adhere to the legislation to which we have already agreed and maintain the courage of our convictions by passing the bill notwithstanding the veto of the President.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, after listening to the debate I cannot help but feel that those who are going to vote to sustain the Presidential veto, insofar as the argument on that question is concerned, are being placed in a somewhat unfair position. Those who shall vote to sustain the Presidential veto will not be voting to deprive the veterans of many of the changes which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and others have advocated. They will become the law of the land anyway. As the Senator from Oregon so fairly said, many of the changes which he advocated have been adopted through Presidential order. Therefore, we are not in the position of saying that there were no injustices in the economy measure which should be remedied. The question is, When does injustice stop in one direction and injustice start in the other direction? That is all there is in dispute here.

The Senator from Oregon said that the review boards were unfair. I was asked, together with my colleague from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], to nominate some men for the review board in Maryland. Between us we nominated three ex-service men, one of whom had served in the same outfit in which I had the honor to serve in France. That board was made up of 2 Republicans and 1 Democrat.

I mention that to show the attitude we took to secure members of the board in whom the ex-service men would have unbounded confidence. Certainly no better board could have been gotten out of the State of Maryland by human beings. Only God himself could have set up a finer ex-service men's board than that which my colleague and I nominated. That review board was a nonpolitical board. It was a board of ex-service men who had served in France under fire. It was a board of men who themselves had distinguished war records. It was a board of men who had shown themselves to be in the leadership in all ex-service men's movements, and so far as I know to this day there has not been a single criticism of the board set-up in Maryland.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I would prefer to yield at a later time.

Mr. CUTTING. I merely want to refer to that particular matter.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; I yield to the Senator. I do not want to be discourteous.

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator on looking at the record should find that the ex-service men of Maryland, in the cases which were reviewed, received favorable action in nearly 53 percent of the cases, and if he should then turn to Illinois and find only 23 percent were allowed, or if he should turn to Pittsburgh, Pa., and find that only 24 percent had been allowed, would he not think that the men who did not have the favorable treatment of which the Senator has spoken were entitled to some consideration from the Senate of the United States?

And, if the Senator will yield just a moment further—

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator want me to answer one question at a time, or does he prefer to ask several questions and then have me answer?

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator prefers, I will continue my inquiry.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUTTING. And if the Senator further found that in the consideration of cases at the Baltimore office the boards considered an average of only 5 cases a day, whereas in Pittsburgh the boards considered an average of 19½ cases per day, would not the Senator think it perfectly obvious that the cases heard before the Pittsburgh board were not getting the same kind of beneficial treatment as that accorded to those in the Senator's own State?

Mr. TYDINGS. Answering the Senator's first question first, the fact that in 53 percent of the cases the soldiers in Maryland were sustained in their contentions, and those in other States with a lower percentage were not sustained, may have been due to the fact that the board was not a good board. There may be injustices there. On the other hand, it is just as logical to draw the conclusion that perhaps the ex-service men in Maryland were more entitled to that for which they asked. Furthermore, may I say that in any event, any man who did not get a successful hearing of his case before the State board may now have it reviewed. The court is still wide open. If the man is right, the forum is there in which he can prove his point; and if he does not prove it in that court—that is, the court of review here in Washington—I have no doubt in the world that if he should appeal to the Senator from New Mexico, and the Senator should be convinced that justice had miscarried, he would get the man a second hearing on his facts, and be there, perhaps, to represent him.

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator will pardon me, the only way I know of to get him a proper hearing on his facts, with any hope of success, is by my vote in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not agree with the Senator, because I know and he knows—we are both going to be honest and candid about this matter—that there have been instances where ex-service men have gotten on the rolls who did not deserve to be there. Let us be fair to both sides of this question.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator if that is not true in the direct service-connected cases just as it is in the presumptively connected cases.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should not like to answer that question.

Mr. GEORGE. I may say to the Senator that for more than 8 years I gave very careful and patient study to these presumptive cases, and I believe I may candidly say that there is evidence to be found in the direct service-connected cases of either fraud or accident quite as often as in the cases which were connected by virtue of a presumption.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator for stating his observation. I think it is sound; and what we want to do is to prevent that fraud from being rewritten on the statute books of this country.

I do not want to see one veteran who is deserving of the help or the assistance or the thanks of this country denied what is his due. Neither do I want to see some veteran receive such help who has so little patriotism that he would conjure up a false set of facts in order to get a pension which is denied others in the same category as is he.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield; but I should like to go along a little and develop my thought, and then I shall be glad to yield. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. STEIWER. I want to ask just one question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Mr. STEIWER. Wherein, in the bill that is before us, is there anything that permits fraud to be tolerated or prevents the Government from setting up fraud as a defense?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is going to cover in all presumptive cases. That was the burden of his argument.

Mr. STEIWER. No; not if they are on the rolls by fraud. The Veterans' Administration itself determines that fact.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course; but the Senator wanted them put there without a trial. I only ask, not that they be not put there but that facts be offered to show why they should go there. The order already provides that every presumption shall be decided in favor of the veteran; and if any veteran from my State has not the presumptions decided in his favor, I shall be very glad to go in person before the board and see that he gets justice.

I am not afraid that a deserving veteran will not get what is coming to him. I do not mean to say that in all respects the order will operate with perfection; but I believe that within the limits of human equity it will do what all of us in our hearts want to do—namely, to give to every man whose injury is in any sense connected with his service, or presumed in any sense to be connected with his service, the help that the Government should give a man in that category.

Therefore the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], in making the point that 29,000 ex-service men would be wiped off the rolls, in my opinion has not accurately presented the facts. As a matter of fact, they get compensation before the case is heard, and are taken off the roll after their case is heard only in the event they cannot make out a case. Who will deny that? Is there anybody here who will deny it? Then, if they are getting compensation while awaiting trial, and, after having had trial, cannot get compensation, it strikes me that in that case they would not be entitled to it.

I desire to call attention to a situation and to draw a comparison. A lady whose husband was killed while going over the top in France gets only $40 a month. The widow of a man who took his musket and went out in the face of hell gets only $40 a month. If we have money to spend, in God's name, let us give this widow more! We know to a certainty that the husband's death was due to wounds received in battle; and we are giving her only $40 a month while we throw away money on cases where we are doubtful whether or not the veteran was disabled in line of duty. Forty dollars a month! That is what we give to the widow of a man who was shot down on the front lines in France; yet we come here and say we have plenty of money to spend for those who quite often never got over to France, and who are unable to prove their cases.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just once more?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. STEIWER. I hope the Senator will not mind the correction. The fact is that the widow referred to by the Senator gets only $30 a month.

Mr. TYDINGS. Thirty dollars is right. If she has children, I think for the first child she gets $8 a month, and if she has two children she gets $6 for each; so that if she is a widow with two children she gets the large sum of $46 a month, although her husband laid down his life over in France, killed in actual battle. We cannot raise that amount; we cannot find the money to do that; but we can vote millions and hundreds of millions in cases the origin of which is doubtful. I do not intend to vote for any cases of that kind until the widows of the World War and the orphans of the World War get more decent consideration than they have had from Congress up to date.

The President, in his veto message and in the orders he has promulgated, is not far afield from the propositions advocated by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]. The President only asks, as to the 29,000 cases which have already received one review, that they have a final review before action shall be taken, and in the meantime the veterans get the compensation which they claim pending a decision of the court. What is unfair about that, if anything? The man gets what he claims up to the time his case is heard, and loses it only in the event he cannot prove, with every presumption in the case decided in his favor, that he is entitled to it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has just asked what is unfair about that. I should like to ask the Senator the same question that I propounded to the learned Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], as to whether or not he has ever attended a hearing before the Veterans' Administration in which the case of a veteran was being considered. If he has, has he noticed, first of all, that the veterans' cases are not considered by a board at all, but by an examiner delegated by the board; and, secondly, that the veteran has no chance whatever, even before the examiner?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I disagree with the conclusion drawn by the Senator; and I may say that many, many times I have been down to the Veterans' Administration in person. Since I have been here, for 11 years, with other Senators, I have probably handled myself many thousands of cases; and I desire to say that by and large I have been able to get favorable decisions in the vast majority of cases. In some of them I have had to have as many as three rehearings in order to produce new evidence.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to be discourteous; but if the Senator will let me proceed, I will then answer any questions I can.

Mr. McCARRAN. Just one question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well. I am getting away off from what I wanted to touch on, however.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not want to get the Senator away from the line of his argument, but does the Senator realize, in keeping with his last expression, that it was a United States Senator who went down there to get the results he has just stated? Secondly, does he realize—and I say this rather facetiously, in keeping with the remark made by the learned Senator from Maryland—that no one short of God Almighty could have named a better board than he did—

Mr. TYDINGS. I still stand by it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does he realize that it is a United States Senator who has put himself in second place to the Almighty Himself? [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not mind being the butt of a little wit from my good friend from Nevada. I think it would be a poor debate without a little good old humor being injected into it, even at my expense.

Mr. President, in my judgment the 29,000 presumptive cases are as fairly dealt with under the present set-up as it is possible to deal with them. I do not know of any better way in which it can be done.

Mr. President, I desire for a moment to go back to January 1933. It will be recalled that we were going through a long depression, which was getting worse with each passing day. I think we were going behind $7,000,000 a day in January 1933. The election was over. Mr. Hoover was still President. The new President had not come into office. There was a sort of slack-water period. To some extent the President could not have taken the action he might have liked to take, because he had just been defeated at the polls. The situation was very black indeed.

On the 1st day of March the Government needed the small sum of $75,000,000 in order to meet bills maturing on that day. It advertised for the $75,000,000, and what do Senators suppose was offered by the investors of the country? Ninety million dollars was offered. Only $15,000,000 was subscribed more than the Government needed at that time to preserve its credit. It had to pay 4¼-percent interest, computed annually, for that $75,000,000, and it wanted the money for a period of only 90 days.

I say to the Senate that when the new President came into office, and we walked out to the east front of the Capitol to see him sworn in, all of us when we came back wagged our heads. The situation was very black, indeed. But because an acute crisis has now passed, we are prone to throw discretion to the winds, and to assume that recovery has come.

It was not long after that that every bank in this country was closed. Then we wagged our heads still more; men wore long faces; they were worried. But by what I think was an inspired leadership at that time, through the passage of an economy bill, injurious in many respects, hastily conceived in many respects, the credit of this Government was saved, and on that foundation we got our second wind, and commenced to function again as a going concern, and not as one headed for bankruptcy.

Many people assume that that is all over, that that is history, that we have no financial worries whatsoever. In this connection let me say that I can sympathize with those who are supporting the bill over the Presidential veto, because, in my opinion, we have wasted millions of dollars in all kinds of vague schemes which had better been left unpromulgated.

Mr. ASHURST. And now we are asked to take it out of the hides of the soldiers.

Mr. TYDINGS. But next winter is coming on, and we have heard the suggestion recently that the C.W.A. be shut off. Eight hundred men marched through the streets here the other day in protest, led by Mr. Norman Thomas. In Maryland today, in Baltimore City, about 1 in every 5 families is on the relief roll. In the United States 10,000,000 people are out of employment.

Pending before the Senate is a bill limiting the production of cotton, notwithstanding the fact that we sell over half the cotton we produce in world trade. There are about 1,600,000 farmers in this country engaged in producing cotton, over half of which is sold in world trade.

These are just a few brief word pictures of existing and past events. We will adjourn shortly and go home, and we will come back next January. What are we to do for the 10,000,000 unemployed next January? How are we going to feed them? Where is the money coming from? Who is going to pay the taxes? Are we running this Government from month to month, or from year to year, or from decade to decade? Apparently all we have to think about is the present. It seems to be thought that next winter, and the winter after that, will take care of themselves. In my opinion, when many of these artificial stimulants are withdrawn, the army of unemployed will grow immediately.

If we were in prosperous times, we might afford to resolve every possible point in favor of any veteran who desired to get on the rolls for one reason or another; but we are not in prosperous times. We have an institution here in Washington that is lending $2,000,000,000 to people in order to save the roofs over their heads. We have an institution here called the "R.F.C.", which has poured out billions of dollars to preserve the savings in the banks of the country. Where the money is coming from, how we are to float the bonds to finance it all, I am not financier enough to say; but I do know there will have to be an end to those artificial activities, that sooner or later we are going to have to put a burden of taxation on the American people which will be so heavy that it will undo all the recovery we have had as a result of the expenditure of that money.

Mr. President, then where will the ex-service man be? What good will it be to give him this benefit if he cannot get a job, if the credit of his Government is gone, if his wife and children need food and there is no relief fund with which to purchase it?

Look over to France. Within the last 10 days we have seen the leader of that country advising the people against civil war. Look over to Germany. We have seen a military leader take over that country because of the distress of its citizens. Does anybody think that because we have an abundance of land and people and resources we are going to escape all the consequences which have come to other countries?

For what did the soldier die in France? Did he die for a country in which the statesmen were so vague about the future that the government was dissolved, that the Constitution was gone, that the institutions for which he was told to fight had passed away, that his wife and children were without the means of getting employment, or without the means of supporting themselves with food and clothing?

The idea of a Congress giving the widow of a man killed in battle $30 a month, a dollar a day, on which to exist, and giving some ex-service man whose disabilities are not connected with the service at all the right to get on the roll without proof, and to stay there forever and ever! Go tell that to the ex-service men and your constituents, and see how many of them will support your view that you treated the widow fairly.

We cannot spend the same dollar for two or more purposes, and I believe that most of the ex-service men are wiser about these things than we think they are. They know the country is going through a terrible period—not only this country but the other countries of the world—and they know that extravagance and wrong are never going to bring this country, or any other country, out of its sad plight. The old farmer who is sitting back on his farm knows that to be so, because he has been through many depressions. The man in the city who is out of work and hunting a job knows that to be so. The banker who is sitting among the ruins of his former glories knows that to be so. The people who are threatened with the loss of their homes know that to be so.

If there is any politics in connection with this bill, it is going to be vastly different from the politics assumed to be in it. I am not going to make a partisan speech, because I believe Senators are acting upon their honest convictions in this matter. But it is a matter of extreme regret to me that in the House of Representatives only two Members of the opposite party voted to sustain the President's veto. I understand that here there will not be a single vote from those on the other side of the aisle—and I do not question their motives. I do not mean to say there is any politics in it; I only mean to say that I regret that it even has the appearance of political expediency.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree that if there is unanimity on this side, it is not due to partisanship. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. That is a very fair observation. I know that two sessions ago most of the so-called "conservative" Members on the other side of the aisle were making long speeches about saving the credit of the Government. My good friend the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], an ex-service man himself, had a long face and a woeful expression when he used to tell about the Government going into the red so many millions of dollars a day, or an hour, or a minute, I have forgotten which it was, and asked us to stand by the President. I stood with him. I listened to the appeal of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am wondering whether he is still talking the same language.

I remember that the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] was a wheelhorse for financial integrity and stability in those days. I know that he, like me, does not approve of the wild expenditure of funds by this and other Congresses. But that will not justify an unwise expenditure of funds in this case, because if it was wrong then, it is wrong now. I remember how my good friend from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], the chairman of the senatorial campaign committee, took me to task for introducing a resolution to cut down Government expenditures, normal expenditures, so that we would not spend more than we were taking in; and when I found that there were legal restrictions in the way, he berated me.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not care to put myself in the position of defending the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Delaware—

Mr. TYDINGS. They need no defense.

Mr. CUTTING. Who undoubtedly can take care of themselves, but I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while the Senator from Ohio did not vote, the Senator from Delaware was one of the six Senators who voted not to extend the presumptive period from 5 years to 10, and that the Senator from Maryland at that time voted to extend the presumptive period from 5 to 10 years.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not doubt that at all, and I should do the same thing over again.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will; but let me first clear up the question the Senator from New Mexico asked me.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment.

Certainly I voted to extend the presumptive clause. I am for it now. Am I arguing for its elimination? I am only asking that where we ostensibly have extended it, we prove that we have extended it. Where is the inconsistency? I ask the Senator from New Mexico to point it out.

Mr. CUTTING. Is that a rhetorical question, or does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator may designate it as any kind of a question he wishes, but I hope he will give me a fair answer.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, the presumptive clause we had at the time of that vote was an un rebuttable presumption in tuberculous and neuropsychiatric cases. The presumptive clause which the Senator voted to extend from 5 years to 10 was an un rebuttable clause. The presumptive clause for which the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Nevada are arguing is a rebuttable presumption which can be rebutted by affirmative evidence on the part of the Government.

What is contained in this bill is no presumptive clause at all, because if the Senator will study the regulations, he will see that the exact regulations in force under the Economy Act still remain in force. It was on that account that former Commander Spafford, of the Legion, and many other ex-service men, refused to serve on the board. There is, however, no requirement at all in effect that these men have to produce documentary evidence to show the incipience of a case of tuberculosis or a case of neuropsychiatric disease; and in most cases it is absolutely impossible for a man on his back in a hospital, or confined in a lunatic asylum, to do any such thing.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator will be fair enough to qualify what he has said by permitting me to observe as a statement of fact that the President has issued an order in which he says that every presumption shall be decided in favor of the veteran.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I desire to point out that that clause has been in every piece of legislation from the beginning. It is nothing new. It is an exact repetition of the same old provision.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but the Senator knows that when it was in former laws the Veterans' Bureau officials themselves passed on it. Now to pass on it we have a review board that has no connection whatsoever with the former Veterans' Bureau. We have a new and an impartial and a finely selected court, and that court has been notified that every presumption as to injury shall be made in the veteran's favor.

Mr. CUTTING. But the basis of proof remains exactly the same.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator has not shown where there is any inconsistency in my position. Even if there were, however, I do not mean that I am so perfect that I cannot be inconsistent at times. I cannot be as perfect as some of my colleagues.

Mr. FESS and Mr. STEIWER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. The Senator referred to my attitude, and correctly.

Mr. TYDINGS. And in a commendatory way, too.

Mr. FESS. The Senator could not do otherwise, because he and I have voted together so often on these questions.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. I should like the Senator to permit me to say that during the former administration I urged the passage of a measure similar to the Economy Act, as the Senator knows, but we never got action upon it. When the new administration came in, and members of the majority introduced the economy measure, although it went further than we had expected in the former administration, I stood for it and argued for it on the floor of the Senate. I did so especially because of the consolidation and the transfer and the elimination of certain bureaus.

If the Senator will yield further, on matters of veterans' legislation the Senator will recall very distinctly that a bill was passed in this body which provided for pensions without service connection, and also without reference to the source of the disability, and also without reference to the pecuniary resources of the veteran. I voted against that bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am not criticizing the Senator.

Mr. FESS. I also voted to sustain the President's veto when he vetoed that bill. Now, this measure comes back with an effort on the part of the Senate to improve it through the elimination of the elements that were offensive in the former legislation, and I have gone along with that effort. The Senator will especially recall, however, that in the original discussion of the Economy Act an amendment was offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and another amendment was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to correct certain inequalities in reference to the Spanish-American War veterans, and we thought they were corrected, but in the administration of the act they were not corrected. Therefore, I voted to correct those in the legislation which came up during the present session. While I care nothing about consistency, I have tried to be thoroughly consistent on this question, as the Senator knows.

Now, as to the statement of the Senator that formerly I stood for economy and now I am not doing so—

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not say that.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator might have said that and have been truthful in his statement. With respect to that matter, the situation is, that with the amount of money we are authorizing to be expended, as the Senator knows, in many directions that he and I questioned, I cannot stand for the application of economy to the veterans.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the last observation of the Senator from Ohio, and that is one reason why I find a great deal of difficulty in growing very enthusiastic over the veto of the bill. Were it not for the consequences, not particularly with respect to this bill, but with respect to all the expenditures which are mounting up for future settlement, the situation would be entirely different.

I have previously brought out this point when fewer Senators were present, but at the risk of repetition I am going to bring it out again.

At the end of this fiscal year we will owe $32,000,000,000. That is the war debt plus what has since accumulated.

Mr. President, the interest on $32,000,000,000 at 3 percent is $960,000,000 a year. Of course we shall have to pay off the debt as well. Let us pay it off over a 50-year period, in 50 annual installments, at the rate of 2 percent a year. Two percent of $32,000,000,000 is $640,000,000. So the first year we shall have to pay $960,000,000 in interest and $640,000,000 in sinking fund, making an annual debt charge of $1,600,000,000. Our revenues last year, I believe, were $2,163,000,000. Therefore, under that dispensation we would have $563,000,000 left upon which to run the Government, and the veterans themselves receive a larger amount than that. Oh, we shall be up against it next winter when the new tax bill comes in, when the bill comes down here for five billion more dollars to take care of those who are in distress throughout the country.

I am not one of the optimists who see prosperity right around the corner. I know there is no royal road to success. We cannot wish ourselves out of this depression. We shall have to have markets where we can buy and sell goods in order to create the demand for employment which will put people back to work. We are going along as though the depression were over and we were on the upgrade and will soon find ourselves back on the level of 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929. I do not care to assume the role of a prophet, but I will venture the prediction that, in my humble judgment, many a man who is for this proposition today will question very seriously the wisdom of his vote when 1935 rolls around with the problems which then will be dumped on Congress.

In March 1933 we came very close to the line of having a Government that could not meet its bills. We may come close to that line again, and nothing that could happen would be worse for this country than would such a condition.

It is not pleasant for me to deny any ex-service man what is his due, or, for that matter, what is not his due. I was not such a conspicuous soldier, but I did serve among many men who made the supreme sacrifice. I can remember now going back home on recruiting duty and taking away 9 men, 3 of whom stayed on the other side, and 2 of whom left legs over there. When I have had the affection and the good will of thousands of men in my own State and elsewhere, it is not pleasant to be in the position of opposing those men; and right here and now I desire to pay my respects to some of the people who are opposing them, even at the price of inconsistency.

I remember that during the World War, when men were dying on the battlefields of France, there were strikes in this country in munitions plants and other plants engaged in furnishing war supplies. Men were serving abroad at a dollar a day, laying down their lives for their country, and those behind were striking for more pay. Perhaps in such strikes there was an element of justice, but it always seemed to me, looking at the battle front ahead and looking back at America away over the sea, that they might have borne what they thought was an injustice, rather than to create the illusion over there that we were being stabbed in the back.

I also want to pay my respects to the thousands of people who became millionaires by virtue of manufacturing articles which were needed in the war and who are now always against everything the ex-service man wants. They think he is entitled to nothing, although all their fortunes, if the truth be told, were made out of and rest upon the blood and death of the battlefield. I have no sympathy for that kind of opposition, not the slightest in the world. If those men came into court with clean hands I would be willing to give them a hearing, but they do not come with clean hands.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if the Senator would like to hasten a vote on the pending question? He has been kind enough on one or two occasions when I was occupying the floor, to suggest that we cease oratory and vote. Would the Senator now take kindly such a suggestion, coming from me? [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Maryland will receive kindly any suggestion coming from the Senator from Louisiana, but will have to refuse the request. May I say to the Senator from Louisiana that the Senator from Maryland only speaks about 10 percent as much as does the Senator from Louisiana. [Laughter.] And, therefore, he feels that in his own time he can continue to speak without being discourteous to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I do not want the Senator from Maryland to acquire the habit against which he now protests so vigorously. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. There need be no fear that I shall acquire many of the habits of the Senator from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recall that while he was on the battlefield across the sea and the strikes were taking place over here, Congress enacted a law relating to what we call the draft, fixing the ages between 18 and 45, with the slogan, "If you do not work, you will have to fight". Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. TYDINGS. I remember it. I do not mean to reflect on the vast number of people who were working and doing all they could. I simply mention, in passing, that when a man was down in a dug-out filled with lice, amid the noise and confusion of shells exploding about him, and men around him whom he knew well were being killed and wounded, that kind of information coming from the United States did not altogether fill him with confidence or even with a semblance of fighting spirit for a country which seemed to him to be worth saving. Nor did it fill him with confidence when he learned of the tremendous fortunes people were making out of the manufacture of war supplies and who now, in most cases, are urged to join any organization which opposes anything by way of benefits to the ex-service men. I want to say this parenthetically, because I do not want to get into the class of war profiteers in opposing provisions which we have placed in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Oh, I thought the Senator had yielded the floor, and I was going to ask for a vote.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator's desires are brighter than his sight. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have said all I undertook to say except in the way of a brief summary.

There should be no presumptive benefits until first of all we give to the widows of battle casualties a higher rate of compensation. A woman whose husband was killed in France deserves more than $30 a month from this Government. No Congress can justify the payment of benefits for other than service-connected disability until such a widow receives greater benefits.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator know of anyone connected with the administration or any Member of Congress or himself who has before this day recommended an increase in the compensation to widows?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Who?

Mr. TYDINGS. I myself.

Mr. WALSH. When?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have been down to the Veterans' Bureau within the last 2 weeks.

Mr. WALSH. Has the Senator introduced such a bill in the Senate?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I have not.

Mr. WALSH. Then we cannot vote on it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, we cannot, but that has nothing to do with the fact that we are voting on the question at issue just the same. But where are we going to get the money to pay the widows when we appropriate it all for men whose injuries were not contracted in the service?

I went down to the Veterans' Bureau the other day, hearing the benefits to widows of war veterans were going to be reduced. I made a protest there and asked that the matter be carried to the President by the Veterans' Bureau officials. I understand it was so carried and the cut was not made. I advocated at that time that the Veterans' Bureau itself send a recommendation to the Congress to do justice to the widows and orphans of veterans of the World War.

No; I have not introduced any bill, but if the Senator from Massachusetts will guarantee that I will get a hearing I shall be very glad to introduce one and we can get a vote on it before we adjourn.

Mr. WALSH. I am more interested in helping the veterans who have nothing than I am in helping widows who have something.

Mr. TYDINGS. The widows not only have nothing, but they have not the men whom they married.

Mr. President, the line of cleavage in the bill is very narrow. There is very little ground of difference. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] advocate restoring to the rolls, without any hearing whatsoever, 29,000 veterans, whose disabilities are at least questionable as having been contracted in war. The President advocates that they all be restored, that they get compensation immediately, and that they stay on the rolls until their cases can be determined individually as to whether or not, giving them the benefit of every doubt, they should continue to remain on the rolls.

I think the President's position is not only more humane in justice to all the veterans concerned, but is predicated upon good common sense, and that there will be an injustice which will turn the people against the veterans if we continue to load the rolls of the Government up with men whose injuries were not connected in any way whatsoever with the service.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield in a moment.

That is the reason why we have the economy law, because we had abused the privilege, and the American people demanded that we restore disability to something like its proper support.

I yield now to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator has not always opposed benefits to men whose disability was not due to service.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course not. I did not say I had.

Mr. CUTTING. I thought the Senator was making a strong case against giving any benefits to them.

Mr. TYDINGS. I said the line of cleavage between the Senator from New Mexico and the President of the United States is very narrow; that if we are going to leave on the roll veterans whose disabilities were not connected in any way whatsoever with the service, even on the ground of presumption, then we ought to let them all get on the rolls, and that I thought the Senator was advocating a proposal which would allow placing on the rolls veterans whose disabilities were not connected with the service, and provide no machinery to purge the rolls when that should happen. I think that is a correct statement of the facts.

Mr. CUTTING. I hope the Senator will reconsider that statement. The veterans whom I am trying to keep on the roll are subject to be removed—

Mr. TYDINGS. I will qualify it. I do not mean to say that the Senator is advocating that veterans who are not deserving should be placed on the rolls; but what I am saying is that the amendment the Senator offers will accomplish the very thing which he says he is against.

Mr. President, if the veto shall be sustained I believe we will write a new bill at this session of Congress which in a large measure will do justice to the veterans. If the veto shall be sustained, that will not mean that the legislation will be dead. The writing of another bill can be started tomorrow morning. The President has shown every disposition to meet the veterans halfway; and where we have pointed out to the President injustices, time and time and time and time again he has broadened the scope of the regulations to permit other groups of veterans to come in under the benefits of the law. Why deny the President what he asks, that the veterans shall have a place where their applications may be presented? He asks only that veterans who cannot come in under the desire of Congress be excluded. Let us sustain the veto of the President. Let us write a new bill. I believe we can do that at this session of Congress; and, in my opinion, if we shall do it, we will by our action have contributed more to the future success of this country than by voting for a measure which is admittedly shot with expediency.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to make a short statement with reference to some things which have been stated during the debate this afternoon.

First, with reference to the amount carried in the bill, and to which reference has been made in the message of the President:

It has been stated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] that the bill does not carry an additional cost of $228,000,000 unless there is included as a part of that cost the sum of $21,000,000, which was added to the bill to provide for the cost of enforcing the regulations issued on January 19.

The Senator from Oregon, who is usually accurate, is inaccurate in that statement; and the explanation of his statement is, in my opinion, that he has calculated the cost solely for the fiscal year 1935 and has overlooked the fact that under the provisions of the bill it will become immediately effective.

The very efficient clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the House, and the equally efficient clerk of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, after securing from the Veterans' Administration the most complete evidence obtainable, have prepared a statement, a copy of which I have in my hand, showing that the total cost of the veterans' amendment, not only for the fiscal year 1935 but for the balance of this fiscal year—the estimate being based upon the bill becoming effective on April 1—will be $103,145,618, and that the total cost of restoring the salary cut will be $124,986,000.

Mr. President, there can be no question of the accuracy of that statement, prepared by the clerks of the two Appropriations Committees.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield; yes.

Mr. STEIWER. In connection with the Senator's last statement that the total cost of pay restoration would be, I think, something like $124,000,000, if I understood the Senator correctly—

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. STEIWER. I am quite sure that statement is correct; but that includes the 5 percent included in the bill by the House. Is not that true?

Mr. BYRNES. No; according to the statement of the clerks of the two committees, it is not.

Mr. STEIWER. How do they account for the fact—

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator that I am going to ask to have this statement printed in the Record, because it is in detail, so that the Senator will have the information.

Mr. STEIWER. I shall be glad to have the information; but I should like to have some further explanation to see how a 5-percent additional restoration could cost $124,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. The clerks have itemized the statement, even calling attention to a fact which previously had been overlooked, that there would be an amount added for the emergency agencies where the compensation was reduced by Executive order, and where it would be restored as a result of our action.

Mr. President, because I do not desire to consume much time, I wish to refer now to what has been said with reference to the presumptive cases. There were 29,000 of those cases; and I desire to call attention to the difference between the so-called "Byrnes amendment" providing for the presumptives and the language of the bill as it passed the Congress.

Under the amendment which was proposed by me, and which was never voted upon because the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] was adopted, the presumptives were to be put back upon the rolls pending the determination of their cases. They were to be paid 75 percent; and if by the board of appeals it should be determined that they had been wrongfully removed from the rolls, they were to be paid back pay from the date when they were removed from the rolls to the date of the decision. Now it is said that the procedure under that proposal, which was yesterday afternoon written into an Executive order by the President, would make it difficult for these presumptives to be restored to the rolls.

Under the Executive order of the President there is a great difference in the procedure to be followed by the Board of Appeals from that which heretofore has been followed. Senators have made the statement that there is no difference, and I know they were sincere in the statement; but the fact is that under the regulations heretofore in existence there was no provision for the special review boards to resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the veteran, the burden of proof in such cases being on the Government. It is true, however, that as a result of the issuance of those regulations a letter was sent by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to every one of these boards instructing them to follow that course in the consideration of the cases; but there occurred the difficulty which has been properly cited in the consideration of these cases. Some men were unable to present their cases. Therefore the President, in his Executive order signed yesterday, directs the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to develop each and every one of these 29,000 cases by correspondence and by investigation, to the end that all available material evidence shall be secured and shall be made a part of the claim before a decision is rendered by the Board of Veterans' Appeals.

No such procedure was heretofore followed; and it was the cause, and in many cases the just cause, of complaint against the action of the Board. But when, by direction of the President, the administrator must make an investigation to secure all evidence, and it is intended even to secure the evidence of neighbors as to the existence of the disease, it cannot fairly be said that there has not been a material change in the procedure which is to be followed in the consideration of these cases.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BYRNES. I will ask the Senator to withhold his question until I complete my statement of the facts.

Mr. President, complaint has been made about the action of these boards. Undoubtedly, because human beings are human and imperfect, mistakes have been made; but I have read statements made by the members of these boards throughout the country, and I do not believe there in justification for the complaints that have been made on the floor of the Senate.

My good friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has referred to one member of a board who said he did not understand the regulations as well as he would like to, and who, therefore, believed he had not restored all the presumptives who should be restored. The fact is, however, that I have on my desk the instructions sent to the members of the board, the letter in which they were instructed to solve every doubt in favor of the veteran, and any man with reasonable industry, reading that letter, and reading the other instructions, would have been in position to render justice to those men. The fact is that justice was rendered, in the opinion of the veterans, in the overwhelming majority of the cases that were considered and were restored by the local boards. We have heard no complaints about the action of the boards in those cases.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BYRNES. At the conclusion of my statement on this subject I will yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I cannot permit the Senator from South Carolina to make a statement which he must know is absolutely at variance with the facts.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator says that, I certainly will yield to him, because I would not want to do that.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator will recall that concerning the very instruction to which he is now referring, the argument was dealt with by the Committee on Appropriations, and, in addition to that, it was disclosed that emissaries were sent out after the instructions to tell these boards what to do, and that message was never recorded.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the Senator entirely misunderstood me. I did not even refer to that particular subject. What I said was that there was no complaint that I knew of on the part of an individual in the Senate, or outside, as to those cases which were restored and are now on the rolls. I do not think any complaint has been made that those who were restored to the rolls should be removed from the rolls.

The Senator is referring to a fact which was developed, and which I have heretofore discussed on the floor of the Senate fully and frankly, with reference to certain criticisms, and especially of one board, and I joined in the criticism.

Mr. President, admitting that on 1, 2, 3, or 4 boards there may have been individuals who did not understand or who were unfair, because that is true, provision is made for this Board of Appeals. We cannot well complain against the personnel of that board and the fairness of the personnel, because all of that personnel has not yet been appointed. They have considered only a few cases, and until they have had an opportunity to demonstrate their fairness or unfairness, we cannot justly criticize them.

Thirty members are to constitute the Board, 18 in no way connected with the Veterans' Administration, 12 to be connected with the Administration. The vast majority of that Board as formerly constituted were ex-service men. When it is completed under the new set-up, the great majority will still be ex-service men. When these cases are considered by them, that board being headed by ex-Governor Pollard, of Virginia, I have no reason to believe that men will be selected who will not be of the same type as Governor Pollard. The board considering these cases can give a fair trial to every one of the 29,000 men.

Some statement has been made to the effect that in the very nature of things the cases cannot be heard promptly, but it will be some months before the cases can be reached, possibly a year. If that be true, then the veteran will have no complaint, because then he will remain on the rolls until his case shall be heard. He will be certain of that, and delay will mean no injustice to him. If, however, his case should be decided in his favor, he will get back pay. If it is not decided in his favor, then who will say that the local board was wrong? I say—and the President said in his message, and says correctly—that of the 29,000 cases which were disallowed, 94 percent represented unanimous decisions on the part of these local boards. Yet some say that the veterans cannot get a fair trial by a board which has not yet been even constituted; that is said even before they start. I cannot believe that is fair or that it is a just criticism.

It is said, What is the difference between us? There is this difference: Under the bill there is a conclusive presumption, as the President set forth, which cannot be rebutted by medical testimony. Because it is a conclusive presumption, under the language of the bill a man can be removed only if they can prove what is termed a "causative factor" and show that by some infection the condition arose. Under the Executive order of the President the presumption exists, but it can be rebutted by medical testimony if such medical testimony is presented, and that testimony is sufficient to convince this Board of Appeals that the case is not a just one and the man should not be continued on the roll.

Mr. President, that is all there is to the presumptive proposal. Hastening along, I want to make a reference somewhat to the history of this matter. I do so because of the statements which have been made.

When the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations was considering the appropriation bill, this legislation was offered as an amendment to the bill. I think every member of the subcommittee will agree that I made an earnest effort to bring about a compromise of the varying views of the members of that committee, knowing what I believed to be the varying views of Members of the Senate. On the pay-cut matter—not because it represented the view of anyone in the Senate or out of the Senate, not because it represented even my own views, but because I hoped that out of it there might come an agreement—I suggested in the subcommittee what was known as "the 5-and-10 proposition." When the proposal was made, and after it was discussed, it must be said that there was no dissent and that there was no division demanded; no vote was taken; and it was unanimously agreed to, so far as we could judge from the expressions of members as to the proposal.

In the general committee on the following day the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] made a motion to restore the full pay. Senators did what Senators always have the right to do, and what other people as well have a right to do, exercising their judgment, voting as they think right; Senators voted differently from the way they had voted before, and by a close vote, a majority of 1, voted to include the so-called "pay cut" in the appropriation bill.

It is said that the proposal was offered on the floor of the Senate, and gentlemen are sincere in saying that, but that really is a mistake; it was offered in the subcommittee, and then reported by the full committee.

On the other proposal, as to Spanish-American War veterans, it is true, as has been stated, that again in an effort to bring the minds of the Senate together I endeavored for some days to effect a compromise. It could also be said, and must be said, that even last week, knowing, as I have known as a result of my experience, that all legislation is the result of compromise, I asked for the postponement of the consideration of the bill for 24 hours to see if a compromise could be brought about. That was not accomplished. When I learned that it could not be done, and that there could be no agreement on the presumptive proposal, I determined that I would make no further effort to try to bring together those who differed on this measure.

Mr. President, that is the history of the matter. I have no criticism to make of anyone. I know that the President of the United States has discharged his duty, just as we have discharged ours. He has vetoed the bill. Over in the House the veto has been overridden.

I refer now to a statement not made upon the floor of the House, but quoting the Republican leader of the House in the newspapers this morning as saying that no President in the history of this Government had ever received so few votes in support of a veto. Of course, it is said this is not a partisan matter, but the Republican leader seemed to rejoice in the statement, inaccurate even though it was, that never before in the history of the Government did a President receive in the House of Representatives so few votes on a veto.

Mr. President, that does not appeal to me. I never question the motives of any man when he casts a vote on the floor of the Senate. However, I cannot close my eyes to the fact that after a vote in a subcommittee, when we went into the full committee, not one man from the other side of the aisle in the Committee on Appropriations voted for the compromise proposal, but every one of them voted for the full restoration. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that that is true, with one exception, as to every other one of the votes taken.

Therefore I wonder if there is not some real rejoicing from others besides the Congressman who leads the Republican Party in the House and who gave to the newspapers this morning the statement that he is quoted with having made.

So far as I am concerned, as the Senator from Maryland said a few moments ago, my mind goes back to March 4 of last year, when throughout this Nation men walked the streets in hunger and we were told 12,000,000, 13,000,000, and 14,000,000 men were unemployed; we saw banks closed, until on the morning of March 4, I think, the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Pennsylvania learned that the last banks that had remained open in the United States had been closed. We saw men driven from their homes. We saw judges threatened with lynching in some parts of this country because they dared to sign foreclosure proceedings. We saw railroads tottering. We saw Congress pass a bankruptcy bill for the purpose of relieving distressed railroads of the country. And because of the condition that existed we saw men wondering whether their insurance policies were good, because the moneys of the insurance companies were invested in banks and in other ways, that we knew meant the depletion of the assets of the insurance companies. We saw men lose not only their money, lose their homes, but lose even confidence in their Government first, and then confidence in themselves.

But there was only this spark of hope: That there was coming into power a new deal, a new President, and because of that hope, even after the banks closed, men walked down Pennsylvania Avenue with bands playing, hope in their hearts, not knowing even the conditions that existed in their homes that morning.

Out of the chaos and the confusion and the destruction that had been wrought we have in the short time that has elapsed seen banks open, merchants once more selling goods, cotton selling for 12 cents instead of 5 cents, and wheat nearer a dollar than the 30 cents that it then was. We have seen men in the automobile plants return to work, and throughout the Nation hope has supplanted fear in the hearts of all the people of this Nation.

That change has come about because of confidence in the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Today when the good Member of the House who leads the minority there rejoices that the President has no followers he strikes not only at the President, but he strikes at the only hope that this Nation now has for a continuance of recovery.

So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to impair in the slightest degree that confidence. Regardless of whatever anyone else is going to do, I shall vote to sustain the President's veto.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I feel as if it would be almost a profanation for me to offer the few remarks I have in contemplation after the clear, manly, and convincing statement just made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Owing to insuperable physical difficulties, as Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee and as chairman of the subcommittee charged with the consideration of the independent offices bill, I was compelled to confide the difficult work to the next ranking Member, being the Senator from South Carolina. I want to say here and now that no Senator on any committee of this body ever exerted more fervent and patriotic endeavor to bring about a satisfactory result in the midst of vehement disagreements.

The suggestion that the Senator from South Carolina ever deceived anybody in the Senate by any statement he ever made, or any vote he ever cast, is an utterly unwarranted aspersion. He never quoted the President of the United States, privately or publicly, as being in favor of this bill. His vote in the Senate for concurrence in the House amendments was not suggestive of any such thing to anybody who had sense enough to be a Member of the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I do not know whether I have less patience with supine submission to Executive authority than I have contempt for gross vituperation of the President of the United States. At least I occupy the happy position of never having manifested submission, or ever having been guilty of the gross impropriety of standing upon the floor of the Senate and insulting the President of the United States, and imputing to him unpatriotic motives, imputing to him a disregard for the uniform of the service men and an indisposition to reward their sacrifices.

Very likely I have more bitterly and repeatedly disagreed with the present occupant of the Executive chair than any other Member of the Senate, and therefore when I shall vote to sustain his veto in this particular matter it will not be from any sense of obedience to party regularity or submission to Executive authority, but it will be from a firm conviction that the President of the United States is right.

Moreover, I say of my own knowledge that, whatever may have been his attitude on the pay cut—and I have not especially interested myself in that question—he has never for one instant deviated from his conviction or hesitated in the expression of his conviction with respect to the particular matter of presumptive cases on the pension rolls.

The distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CURTIS], who did me the honor of suggesting that I, at least, was consistent, opined that no Senator would go out and say that he voted against the bill that contained the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I wonder if all those in another branch of the Government may go out and claim that they did not masquerade behind the veterans in order to get their own salaries increased 5 or 10 percent? Separate these two questions, and I venture to express the belief that the President would not have a great deal of trouble in having his veto message sustained.

Mr. President, I have held to the position expressed at the last session of Congress, as the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CURTIS] will recall, that in this time of desperate distress, if at any time, no man should be upon the pension rolls of the United States who is not entitled to be there. I also expressed the conviction in committee and on the floor of the Senate that no man who could trace his disability to service for his country should, as a mere matter of economy, have his compensation reduced one farthing. On the contrary, my attitude is that every unworthy man on the pension roll in that measure makes it impossible for the Treasury of the United States to reward adequately every worthy man on the pension roll.

It is not a question of money. The pension roll of this country should be a roll of honor and not have upon it any man who is willing to raid the Treasury of his country simply because he wore its uniform.

It has been suggested here that the leader on this side of the aisle and the President have derided the uniform, the Senator not being present in the Chamber when the suggestion was made. There is not a semblance of truth in the accusation.

I do not have to plead sympathy with the veterans in Virginia. They know and have always known my attitude. I come from a community that was so eager for the fray and for the service of the country that it did not have to answer the draft. So many of its boys volunteered that they were beyond the quota when resort was made to the draft. I think I have somewhat of the spirit of that community and of those boys, some of whom, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] said of his comrades, never came back from France and others of whom left their limbs on French soil.

I agree with the President and I agree with the leader on this side of the Chamber that the mere fact that a man had on a uniform does not entitle him in perpetuity to raid the Treasury of his country when it is in distress or at any other time. When he was drafted he had to go. His choice was as between getting shot here or shot at over there, and the mere fact that he wore a uniform does not entitle him, as I said, forever thereafter to be upon the pension rolls of his country. Thousands of them never got better food, never had better clothing, never had finer discipline in all their lives.

Among the volunteers I had two boys of my own; and I would disinherit them if they ever accepted a dollar from their Government, although they were in the front line of the trenches.

Only the exaltation of patriotism, of love of country, sustained mothers and fathers whose sons were in France fighting for their country; and to tell me that a sentiment such as that, which only God can instill, should be transformed into commercialism, is something so abhorrent to my conception of patriotism that I have never been able to tolerate it for a minute.

Mr. President, I rose chiefly to pay tribute to the patient efforts of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in performing the duty which ordinarily I should have had to perform, and performing it better than I ever could have performed it, and to resent some of the abominable suggestions that have been made upon the floor of the Senate.

I shall vote to sustain the President, not only because he is the President—for God knows I have differed with him enough to make that clear—but I am going to vote to sustain his veto because I believe it is right.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the matter pending presents to the Senate in a very direct and, I suspect, in a more vital way than could be wished the question of the leadership and the prestige of the President of the United States in his party and in his country, in a time of indescribable difficulty and distress. It also presents a question not of compensation or pensions or allowances to soldiers, but merely an incidental question of administration and of increases. It also presents the question of pay of the civil servants of the Nation, not being a question as to whether or not they will be paid, but mainly a question of how much their pay shall be restored as against the cuts under the Economy Act.

These three questions may be considered important, the first of them being of the first importance; but, if I mistake not, there is a higher and incomparably more vital question presented here with respect to the course of the American Congress and the present administration in the matter of the administration of the fiscal policy of the country, in the hope—not in the realization, but in the hope—of a recovery and of better days.

We are not out of the depression, Mr. President, and it is a serious question whether we are getting out. Senators who lay the flattering unction to their souls, because there has been a measurable and gratifying reaction, because there has been something in the nature of a rebound, something, I should be happy to say, in the nature of progress out, that we have found the way, that the storm is past, and that there is daylight ahead, I think have utterly mistaken the nature of what has happened within the year.

I am going to recall at this point, for the benefit particularly of those who have been described so often here as our friends on the other side of the Chamber, that an appeal was made here in the spring of 1932, and made from the other side, and made in the name of the President of the United States, that we should proceed forthwith and within specified hours, and by midnight of a certain date, to balance the Budget of the United States or take the alternative of a collapse the consequences of which no man could describe, and for which no man could afford to be responsible.

I take it my friends remember those hours and remember the speeches they made, and I hope they will remember, with respect to me, that I responded to those appeals and voted for taxes which I have hated from the day I knew how to hate, and which I will hate as long as I live; but I voted for those taxes because I did feel that the situation of that hour was directly related to the interest of all the American people, and that it was my duty, come what might by way of political consequences, to rise to the occasion; and I have never regretted it. My name is written in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as voting for the bill to balance the Budget under the Hoover administration, and I am not ashamed of it.

Yet at this hour here is a veto from the Democratic President of the United States undertaking to prevent the Congress from hopelessly unbalancing the Budget, and there are men here who are doubtful about their course. I will not make the distinction as between one side and the other.

It is not a question with me, Mr. President, as to the soldier; it is not a question as to the civil servant; the question presented here to me, first, is the question of the relation of a balanced Budget to the recovery of the American people from the depths of a depression which has threatened for 5 years to destroy the country as well as themselves.

Now, hear me about that for a moment. We are not out of the depression. I was gratified that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] spoke as he did, but I have been amazed as I have heard men here talk about spending $228,000,000 over and above the Budget, increasing the salaries of the civil servants by $125,000,000, as if by some sort of miracle prosperity had returned and all were well in this land.

A little progress has been made, I hope, and I am proud of the statistical showing that probably business has been accelerated by 20 percent over a year ago. Probably, we may say, the banks of the United States have been stabilized, but if we say it, we say it only on condition that the credit of the United States Government shall be maintained. We may say that farm prices have increased in the domestic relation, we may say that wages have been increased also, but have we forgotten that, as we sit here and fondly contemplate the prospect of increasing our salaries along with the others, every word that comes from over the land is to the effect that there are some 25 or 30 million human beings depending for clothing and food upon the largess of their Government.

Now raise your salaries, in view of that, and you will put yourselves with Louis XVI of France before the people of starving France. Vote your Government's civil workers a restoration of 10 percent of their pay, while 10,000,000 of our fellow Americans, the victims of the taxes from which we derive our salaries, eight or ten million human beings, are in the plight of the unemployed; and we have never measured that.

I hope I may say it reverently, I hope I may say it respectfully; the unemployed man is nearer to hell than any other human being can be this side of death and damnation. The man who wants work and cannot work is worse off than the slave who is allowed the consolation of work.

Carlyle painted the picture a hundred years ago of a man helpless for the want of a chance to bend his back, or employ his hands, or occupy his brain. And here we are, with eight or ten million of our fellow Americans deprived of the opportunity to work, and many of them have children, and many of them have wives; here are we, knowing that we have had to spend a billion dollars through the winter to keep them from revolting against the civilization, in a just revolution; for men who cannot work because there is no work for them to do, men who must starve because they are not allowed to work, have some rights. I would not make an incendiary speech for my right arm, but they have rights, and they have a right not to starve. God knows they have a right not to starve.

The father of a little boy has the right to go home, after a hard day's effort to earn the bread for the boy and his mother, he has the right to go home with something for them to eat. That is an inalienable right. It is deeper than the Constitution. It is deeper than the Declaration of Independence. It is deeper than civilization. It is as deep as the heart of the God that made them.

Here we are, hearing men seriously propose to override the veto of the man to whom the millions of America turn as they never turned to any other human being from the foundation of this Republic. The man who was the center of their hope, he who is the anchor of their faith, he in whom their confidence is reposed—it is proposed that we destroy his prestige and override his veto in order that we may vote away moneys to people who are already receiving money, compensation to public servants who are already living on the Government, and living fairly well.

Mr. President, that is our situation. For my part I do not want to face the country under such a situation. I do not mean the electorate. I mean the country. There is a capacity back yonder for righteous indignation, and the first note of mass injustice that strikes in this country will strike to the depths that sound with righteous indignation. We will not hear the end of it until a righteous government and a just course shall be restored in America.

Mr. President, those are the considerations that move me.

Where is the unity of our country tonight? I heard that one of the Senators said something about the President being down yonder at Miami in the little boat on the Atlantic. Very well. If he were at the North Pole, the unity, the national unity, the hearts, and the hopes and the faith of 125,000,000 of human beings, the sense in the breasts of the 10,000,000 unemployed, the sense that justice will yet be done to them, will sleep in the bed in which his heart beats tonight. And here are you and I. Here are you and I inviting a course that will tell the American people that Congress and his party have broken with him.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Did the Senator vote against President Roosevelt's message to ratify the St. Lawrence Treaty?

Mr. BAILEY. I did. And if the Senator thinks that that is a commentary on my remarks, I will just have to let him think it.

I have said nothing here that meant, and I think every intelligent Senator here knows that I have said nothing here that meant that a man must just follow the President in everything he says.

I have not said that, and I have not thought that way and I have not acted that way. But when the President of the United States comes to the Congress with a veto of a matter of the fiscal policy of the United States, and when he tells us that the fiscal policy involved is the balancing of the Budget, or the keeping of the Budget in balance with a view to recovery, then that is a matter in which all doubts can be resolved. There is a matter in which every doubt can be thrown aside.

Mr. President, I want to talk about that balancing of the Budget. We do not ever seem to understand one simple thing here. With my latest breath I should like to bear witness to this, that the American people do not have a chance to get out of the depression until their Government balances its Budget. There never was a spark, there never was a little shining line under the clouds until the President sent us the message in March 1933, saying we must put our house in order, we must balance the Budget; and when that message came down and Congress responded to it, as it did, this country moved forward out of the depression at a speed that amazed it and all the world. We all know that.

The message he sent us on yesterday recalls the message of March 1933, and he is standing today where he stood then, and if we would stand today where he stands now and did stand then, if we balance the Budget, stabilize the country, quit spending money needlessly, I feel that I could at last give guaranty that the mud sills on which the Republic is to be rebuilt and the civilization restored would be, at last, in place.

We hear talk about us as if we had never done anything for the American soldiers. We hear talk here today as if the soldiers had been cruelly treated. They have been more highly honored by the American people, they have been paid more money by the American Government, than any other soldiers on the face of the earth. I have the data here, and I am going to read it into the Record. It is an amazing thing.

Total expenditure on behalf of World War ex-service men in the year 1931-32:

In France, $277,000,000.

In Germany, $285,000,000.

In the United Kingdom, $240,000,000.

In the United States of America, $860,000,000.

We spent, in 1931 and 1932, $57,000,000 more for the veterans of our World War than France and Germany and the United Kingdom of Great Britain combined. And the statement is made and men talk as if we had done nothing for the soldiers.

But that is not all. Number of men as of 1919 disabled by wounds or sickness in the World War:

In France, 2,052,000.

In Germany, 4,202,000.

In the United Kingdom, 1,869,000.

A total in France and Germany and the United Kingdom of 8,124,000 disabled by wounds or sickness in those three countries.

In the United States of America—and I praise God for it—the number was only 192,369.

From which it appears that in the care for the combined number of war disabled men, exceeding those of the United States by over 7,900,000, the three European countries together expended in 1931 and 1932, $57,000,000 less.

Does the Senate get the force of that? Eight million men in the United Kingdom, in France, and in Germany received less than 192,000 did in America. And yet we are told we have done nothing for the soldier. We are even told that unless we do more they will put us out of the Congress. Yet when the President, in the interest of the public welfare, asked that the Budget be balanced, or, rather, that we do not throw it out of balance, his name is bandied about here as if he were a gangster.

Those are not all of the figures, Mr. President. In the World War the United States had in combat service 1,390,000 men and in 1932 we had 771,000 on the pension rolls out of the 1,390,000. Not generous? Compare that with the figures I am about to read. The United Kingdom had 5,000,000 men in the service—that is, in the line of fire—and she had only 480,000 on the pension rolls. France had 7,900,000 men in combat and had 1,000,000 on the pension rolls. Germany threw 12,000,000 of her sons into that combat and had only 900,000 on the pension roll.

But that is not the whole story. We can take the statistics and look at them any way we please, and we will find by every mark and measure and standpoint—and this is my point—that the Republic of the United States has done more for its soldiers than any other government on the face of the earth. I say, Mr. President, and from the depth of my heart, that these men love their country, and I think that, out of honor to them, those who respect these men ought to love their country well enough to stand by the President when he asks that the Budget of the United States shall be kept in balance in order that a prostrate country and a prostrate people may have some hope, in order that the soldiers themselves may find a proper place in the sun in which, given a chance, to acquit themselves in ways worthy of their fathers.

Now I have a word to say about the public servant. There is not a man in America who can afford to go before the American people and demand that his own pay be increased or that the pay of any of the public servants be increased while the country is in the condition in which it now finds itself. I know the salaries of Government employees are low, but they are not as low as the salaries of the men who walk the streets hungry and in utter poverty.

Government employees say their salaries have been cut. They were cut 15 percent. There are millions of clerks in America whose salaries were cut 50 percent. The income of every farmer in America was cut practically to nothing. Yet here we are going to restore the Government employees to their pay and return them to prosperity and the condition in which they were when the dread panic struck, and leave 30,000,000 of their fellow human beings helpless and in the ditch.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he voted for the bill which took up the slack of the depreciated currency of America in foreign countries?

Mr. BAILEY. I never heard of a bill like that. If the Senator wants to know whether I voted for the devaluation of the American dollar, I did, and made a speech here about it, and I am not a bit ashamed of it. It has been endorsed all over the country since that time and I think accepted on both sides of the Senate.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator answer my question?

Mr. BAILEY. I could not answer the question. The Senator asked if I voted for a certain bill. I never heard of the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Did the Senator vote for the bill he mentioned?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, I did. The Senator from Nevada is laboring under a delusion. He thinks that the bill to which I referred reduced the salaries of public servants in America. It did not do any such thing. It reduced the value of the American dollar in terms of gold in foreign commerce. The main trouble with the bill is that it has not had any domestic effect to speak of. If it is that at which the Senator from Nevada is driving, that answers his question. That is the way I voted.

Now I come again to the public servants. Let me say a sober word about these public servants. I am one of them. The public servant, whether he be a clerk or a Senator, or what not, who in circumstances like these seeks to better his estate at the expense of his fellow men throughout the land invites and deserves destruction. He will get it, too. Think of the mind of the man who walks the street here night and day. He has to stand in the bread line to get food to fill his stomach. Think of the father who returns to his little cottage at night without the money to pay the rent. Think of the mother who puts her little child to sleep without the hope of breakfast in the morning save by the aid of public charity.

Think of them, looking at you and looking at me, while we raise the pay of public servants in the United States over the will of their President to the tune of $125,000,000 a year. The public servant who cannot suffer with the public is not fit to be a public servant. The public servant who cannot make sacrifices in these times, whether he be Senator or President or janitor or clerk, ought to be stricken from the pay roll of his country.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator from North Carolina have any doubt that if the present public servants are dissatisfied with the salaries their places could be filled within a day's time by people as efficient or more efficient than they are?

Mr. BAILEY. I shall not go into that comparison. I should judge from the general correspondence that there is no want of people to fill public positions in the United States, and never has been! [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there for a suggestion in reply to a remark of the learned Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Government of the United States tried that very system, and it has cost us millions of dollars, because we put out of the C.W.A. into the navy yards of this country and into the Federal employment agencies of this country men who do not know their business, and who today are on the Government pay rolls, although they could not perform the duties to which they were assigned.

A life devoted to industry is a worshipful thing, and a life given to a nation's welfare will always stand out; and a Federal employee who has devoted his life to his country, and knows that he has nothing save his pay check from then on, must of necessity be recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if the President's veto shall be overridden, his message informs us that no provision has been made for the $228,000,000 by the sum of which the Budget will be thrown out of balance.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. I understand from the analysis of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEWART], whose computation was not denied, that the increase will be only a little over $80,000,000 instead of one hundred and twenty-eight million, as set forth in the veto message and as reiterated by the Senator from North Carolina.

It has been a source of no little wonder to me, as I have sat here during this entire administration, that the subject of balancing the Budget never is mentioned unless it is a question of doing something for our injured soldiers or for our Federal employees.

In this veto of the act of Congress restoring the pay cut of disabled veterans and Government clerks, the President presents the astounding pretense that he is trying to balance the Budget.

In his message to Congress in January, the President told us that instead of balancing the Budget he proposed to produce a Budget deficit of $7,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000.

Since then he has bought preferred stocks of banks in the sum of several hundred millions, and has paid out $200,000,000 in premiums on gold to London and Paris.

He is now spending nearly a billion a month, at the rate of $3 of outgo to $1 of collected revenue. It is only when disabled veterans and civil-service clerks need the restoration of earned dues that he resorts to the pretext of balancing the Budget.

Why unbalance the Budget by $7,000,000,000, $10,000,000,000, $32,000,000,000, and then haggle at $80,000,000? What a farce to talk about balancing the Budget when the President admits that he is going to unbalance it by $10,000,000,000 by the end of this fiscal year!

We are asked to save at the spigot of the Government workers' wage, and then knock in the hoghead at both ends until we have wasted ten billions. Why "sic" the "big, bad Budget" upon the poor little injured soldier, with his tin cup, trying to salvage some of this wanton waste? Why be Shylock, and demand this pound of flesh nearest the heart of the laborer and the soldier of our country? Why not practice economy somewhere else than to take it out of the laboring man and the man upon whom we depend for the defense of our homes and our country? Why swallow the camel and gag at the gnat?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I take it that that is a speech and also a remark about a pound of flesh.

Here is a man down in a department—I will put it low—getting $1,200 a year. Here is an American citizen walking the streets and begging for a living. Who has the pound of flesh?

The Senator asks me about balancing the Budget. I am not one of the Senators who have raised this question of balancing the Budget whenever soldiers' bills have come up. I have never had a doubt, from the moment I took the oath of office here, that a balanced Budget is the basis of recovery; and I will call the attention of the Senate right now to the fact that the brightest spot in the way of hope in the whole world at this moment is England. She is coming through this depression. She has only 2,100,000 men out of work, and Sheffield, in England, is advertising for men; and the only thing England had to do was to bear the brunt, balance the budget, and carry on.

The main trouble in the United States of America, the basic trouble—and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] hears me almost reecho the words he uttered here in 1932 from this side—is the failure of the American Government to balance its Budget. Until we do it we shall never know whether or not our bonds will be worth a dollar. Until we do it we shall never know whether or not our banks will crash in 30 days. Until we do it the taxpayer will never know what a day will bring forth, or whether or not he can pay his taxes at the end of the year. Until we do it there can be no borrowing by industrial enterprises in America.

The uncertainty of Monte Carlo or the stock exchange is not comparable to the uncertainty of a country that tries to go along with an unbalanced budget. It gives the whole body politic, industrial and personal and commercial, delirium tremens; and yet here we are, for one reason or another, throwing out of balance the Budget, and saying not one word as to what we will do or where we will go to get the $228,000,000 that the overriding of this veto will cost.

Mr. President, I desire to say another word about this matter, and then I shall take my seat.

It is very rarely that anybody in this body ever says a word for the taxpayer. Now and then a voice is weakly lifted in behalf of the consumer, but I do not know that I have heard anybody say anything about the taxpayer; and yet governments live by taxpayers. That is one thing the United States Government cannot get along without—taxpayers. Having loaded them down with what we conceive to be the prospect of some $4,000,000,000 of taxes, counting the processing taxes, having exhausted every resource of taxation that is available to us, having carried the tariff as high as the skies, having lifted the income brackets as high as we could, having reached down into the cradle and robbed the heirs, having laid upon mankind every excise that we could conceive of and every excise tax is a tax defined as one that is passed on, here we are calmly proceeding to pile another burden of $228,000,000 on top of all that.

Who pays it? There are men here who actually believe—and I give them credit for being sincere in their belief—that that tax burden is paid by a gang of millionaires on Wall Street; and then there are men here who believe that that tax burden is borne by certain big corporations scattered about the country. Men who believe that sort of thing are fit only for fairylands. There is not a tax in America, outside of the estate taxes and the income taxes—and they, together, will not come to one billion two hundred millions out of the four billions—that is not passed on to the back and the stomach of the worker and the farmer.

We tax the power company, and the man who buys the light pays the tax.

We tax the steel corporation, and the man who buys the plow pays the tax.

We tax the railroads, and the man who pays the freight pays the tax.

We ought to know, Mr. President, why there are 8,000,000 men walking the streets of America today looking for work. I will tell you. It is largely because they have been taxed out of their jobs.

The first thing this Government ought to do, and the first thing the government of North Carolina ought to do, and the first thing that my city of Raleigh ought to do, and the first thing that my county of Wake ought to do, is to find ways and means of lifting the burden of taxation in order that men may work and businesses may flourish; yet we come here and vote appropriations, $150,000,000 at a stroke, like gamblers throwing dice in a crap game down in an alley.

Do we ever think how hard it is for somebody to pay these taxes? We say a hundred millions on the face of the bill, or two hundred and twenty-eight millions on the face of the bill. How many farmers must plow, how many workers must work, how many business men must keep store, how much goods must be bought, how many pennies must be saved in order that those taxes may be raised?

I wish to Heaven that we could once realize that every tax laid is a burden upon industry, upon agriculture, and upon commerce. I would that we could get out of our minds that we can lay a tax on a big bank, or a big corporation, or a rich man and run the Government. The taxes are passed on, and always will be. If I understand the laws of the United States aright, they are intended to be passed on. They are described in the Constitution as imposts and excises, and imposts and excises are, in contemplation of law, always to be passed on.

Mr. President, I ask not just for the sake of the prestige of the President of the United States, the chosen leader of the people, faith in whom is of more value right now in the United States than any amount of legislation we may enact; I ask not only in the interest of recovery from this depression, but I ask in the interest of the welfare of 125,000,000 people, that the veto of the President be sustained, and that America be told, and that the world be told, that this country has the courage and the wisdom to balance its Budget and make its way through this depression.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate more than a very few minutes. I simply desire to state quite briefly my reason for voting as I expect to vote when the roll is called. I will say in the beginning that I shall vote to sustain the President's veto of the bill.

Usually it is rather easy to make a choice between two courses of action, sometimes it is rather difficult. In this case I have no difficulty. There have come to me, as there have come to all of the Members of this body, numerous letters and requests that we support the bill for one reason or another. I can hear now the loud demand for overruling the veto of the President.

I know that there are groups and classes who are deeply interested, who are desirous of having an increase in pay and other legislative benefits. I sympathize with them as I sympathize with anyone who is in distress. But, sir, while I hear the voices come to me from my State and from people in other States I cannot forget that there is another side to this picture. This question has been discussed from every viewpoint and every angle. What I shall say will be nothing new.

Mr. President, I recall that only a little more than 12 months ago the whole land was in sorrow and distress. Many millions of people were unemployed, they were suffering and starving. A little more than 12 months ago there was not a single bank open in the Nation, manufacturing establishments were closed down, distress was the commonest thing in the whole Nation. As was well said by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] a few moments ago, we have not yet gotten away from that distressful situation, from that great depression which covered the whole Nation.

Mr. President, I am not here making a plea for anyone to stand by the President simply because he is a member of my party. I am not supporting him in this matter because he and I belong to the same party; but he stands as the leader of the Nation, the one who has charge of the affairs of the Government, who is bending every effort to lead us into better and more prosperous times. He has a broader grasp of the general situation than anyone else. Information comes to him from every source and every section.

The President has suggested to the Congress in his veto message the reasons for this veto, the necessity for his action. He called attention to the fact that it was necessary to maintain the credit of the Nation.

Some gentlemen would sneer whenever the word "budget" is mentioned; but the Budget is an important factor in the present situation. The credit of an individual, of a State, of a nation, depends in a very large degree upon its budget. We cannot maintain the credit of our Nation unless there is a sincere and honest and effective effort made to have the Budget balanced.

It has been suggested that vast sums of money are being expended by the Government, and that is true. Men talk about the billions of dollars of indebtedness and the billions of dollars being expended by this administration. Vast sums of money have been expended, of course; but why was that money expended? It was expended in order to relieve the distress of the people over all the country; not one class, so far as society goes, but in another sense a great class—much larger than either class that is now clamoring for the passage of this legislation—is interested very deeply. The multiplied millions of unemployed—why should they not be helped? It is not only a Christian duty that such action be taken, but it is in effect an insurance of the perpetuity of our national institutions.

I recall that there were not simply low whisperings, soft murmurs, but there were clamorous noises carrying menace, carrying threats to our Nation, and it became necessary that action be taken.

The Economy Act has been referred to as an infamous measure. I do not so consider it. In my opinion, if legislation of that character had not been enacted, it is entirely possible that there would have been a revolution that might indeed have brought destruction to us.

Occasionally I hear suggested that millions of dollars are being loaned to banks, to railroads, to industries, to corporations of various kinds. When money was loaned to a bank it served a splendid purpose if it kept that institution open. Deposits do not belong to the bank. If a bank has a thousand depositors then there are a thousand people who are interested in that particular institution. Not only are those people interested, but also those who live in that particular community, those individuals who do not have a dollar in the bank but who must depend upon money coming from some source in order to carry on their work, thus not only making a livelihood thereby for themselves but giving to many others perhaps, in some cases thousands of others, an opportunity to work and to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families.

Suppose the banks of the Nation should not have been reopened. Suppose the great railroads of the country should have stopped running their trains. Suppose the great manufacturing plants had not continued their work, then, instead of having 12,000,000 unemployed, the number would have been multiplied many times.

I recall that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] referred to those who were dissatisfied because there has been a decrease in pay, a decrease in salary. I hear those complaints many times, and I have sometimes said to men who have complained to me that their salaries have been reduced, and sometimes have seemed to be rather bitter about it, "Walk the streets of your own community; go out along the country lanes, and there you will find many people who have no employment whatever, who live and wear clothing simply because of what they are able to receive from charity."

As I said in the beginning, I place on one side those who want an increase in pay, who want an increase in compensation, and I place on the other all the people of the Nation, including these in the first group, and when I view the situation in that light it is easy indeed to determine how I shall vote, because as has already been said, unless the credit of the Nation is maintained, unless the Budget is balanced, not only will the first group suffer but the entire population will suffer also.

So I stand for the Nation, I stand for the institutions of the Nation, I stand for all those things that have made us the greatest Nation on the face of the globe.

I shall say just one word more. In the veto message it is suggested that there will be some increase in pay before long. It is suggested also that the situation with reference to the veterans will be very materially changed. I shall not defend the Veterans' Administration, because I feel quite sure that many mistakes, many injustices have come about. But those matters will be remedied, in my judgment, in a very large measure, inasmuch as the President of the United States himself has given his word to the Congress, to the veterans, and to the people of the Nation, that the mistakes will be remedied so far as possible, and that many injustices will be remedied, and that this work will go forward as speedily as possible.

My vote will express my desire to preserve the Nation. The fight against the depression is not over. It is only begun, and it must be carried on if employees are to continue to draw salaries, veterans compensation, and the normal business restored.

I might say much more, but I have simply desired to express, very briefly, my reasons for casting my vote as I expect to cast it in a very few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding? Under the requirement of the Constitution, the roll will be called.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ERICKSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. If permitted to vote I should vote "yea", and I understand the junior Senator from Florida, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana announced that he had a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and that if permitted to vote he would vote "yea", and the Senator from Florida would vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as the Vice President well knows, on such a question as that now being voted on, a single pair of that kind is not permitted.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has raised the question that in a case of this kind a Senator voting "nay" must pair with two Senators voting "yea."

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. I also, with the Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], have a pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], which, I assume, makes the pair complete. I have received a telegram stating that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] cannot be here but that, if he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." I think that completes the pair.

The Chief Clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. PITTMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Florida, and repeat the same statement that I just made on the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who, I understand, if present, would vote "nay." The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] and also the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] would vote "yea", and those two Senators being paired with the Senator from Illinois, I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] and the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] are unavoidably detained from the Senate. They are both out of the city. If they were present, they would vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The roll call resulted—yeas 63, nays 27, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 63; the nays are 27. Two thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 7513) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT, as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations of United States attorneys for the eastern and western districts of Washington, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(For nominations received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nominations of the following-named assistant surgeons to be passed assistant surgeons in the United States Public Health Service, to rank as such from the dates set opposite their names: Mason V. Hargett, February 16, 1934; Cassius J. Van Slyke, March 3, 1934; Erwin W. Blatter, April 4, 1934; and Russell Thomas, April 6, 1934.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 10 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, March 29, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 28, 1934

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

James M. Simpson, of Washington, to be United States attorney, eastern district of Washington, to succeed Roy C. Fox, whose resignation is effective at the close of February 28, 1934.

J. Charles Dennis, of Washington, to be United States attorney, western district of Washington, to succeed Anthony Savage, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we praise Thee that behind the ebb and the flow of this ageless world is Thy spirit, which cannot die. The material things will fulfill their function and pass away, but the thought of man is higher than them all. Because we are Thine, made in Thy image, be with us in our aspirations; prevail at every point to make Thy counsel stand; correct the false and strengthen the weak. O let our finer instincts attain supremacy, and nourish in us the genius of heavenly love and power. Holy Spirit, be in us a purer and a diviner flame; may we have the qualifications of true workers for God and humanity. In the love of God, in the grace of Jesus Christ, and in the communion of the Holy Spirit may we have the satisfying and the abiding sweetness of life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following date the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

On March 27, 1934:

H.R. 5863. An act to prevent the loss of the title of the United States to lands in the territories or territorial possessions through adverse possession or prescription; and

H.R. 7966. An act to authorize the Postmaster General to accept and to use landing fields, men, and material of the War Department for carrying the mails by air, and for other purposes.

HENRY A. BARNHART, GENTLEMAN AND FRIEND

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objections?
There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a congenial, generous soul that once adorned these legislative halls and made everybody here happy by his presence passed through the portals of the unknown land day before yesterday.

The oldtimers in this great legislative body well remember Henry A. Barnhart, of Indiana, and news of his death has brought deep and sincere sorrow to the older Members of this House, who knew and loved him.

The sad tidings of his departure has been received with silent and reverential respect in the cloakrooms that used to reverberate with laughter when he assumed the role of entertainer, for in his heyday there was not among all the Members of this great body and among all the public officials at Washington his equal as a story-teller.

For 11 years, as a Member of Congress for the old Thirteenth Indiana District, he spread joy and sunshine around these legislative halls. His wholesome and infectious humor was a soothing balm to troubled spirits and contributed mightily to make congressional life worth living.

As an impersonator he was without a peer, and his mimicry was doubly enjoyable because it never left a sting. When he imitated Champ Clark's booming voice in Missouri dialect he seemed more like Clark than Clark himself. Gen. Isaac R. Sherwood, with his high falsetto voice, was no more real in the flesh than when he spoke through his Hoosier interpreter. One of the perennial delights of the Democratic cloakroom was Mr. Barnhart's florid rendition of Percy Quin's famous speech:

Gentlemen of the House, there comes a time in the lives of all of us when we must rise above principle!

The plantation humor of good old Ben Humphreys, of Mississippi, lived over and over in Mr. Barnhart's impersonations of that quaint character and he could portray Jo Byrns, Jack Garner, or Henry Rainey with uncanny realism. For a long time after he quit Congress he made what he called a "hegira" once a year back to Washington and his coming was always hailed with delight by his old cronies because it always marked the beginning of the open season for a fresh rendition of the old stories that never lost their charm or any of their delectable qualities in the retelling.

Mr. Barnhart was made of the best quality of Hoosier homespun. He possessed a ruggedness of character that reminded one of something majestic, like the beauties of Lake Manitou or the gorgeous loveliness of the hills of Brown County clothed in the marvelous tints of autumn. His greatness was elemental and was composed of many virtues, outstanding among which were honesty, sincerity, and friendship of such quality that the older it grows the tighter it binds. It seemed so fitting that he should be always happy, because he made everybody around him happy.

All his life he was a newspaperman and, as one who also belongs to the fourth estate, I believe his newspaper experience gave him the human touch. His sympathy was abounding and his interest in people was intense.

He also loved his dog and, to my way of thinking, that is an omen of character. I have never known a man who loved dogs as Mr. Barnhart loved them who was not a good man. His eulogy on dogs is a cameo of literature, as perfect as Senator Vest's tribute to that faithful animal.

Mr. Barnhart died in the fullness of years, honored and revered by everybody in his home community where he had long been hailed as the first citizen. He was not called suddenly, but it seemed as if Providence, realizing the love that bound him to mortals, gave him, even after the seal of death was on him, opportunities to tarry yet a while. He had ample time to fold the draperies of his spirit about him before he entered the presence of the Great King and he finally went so quietly and peacefully it seemed he was not dead at all, but that in the language of the immortal Hoosier poet—

With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand
He vanished into an unknown land.

It is sad to part with one who was so sterling and so true, but we may find comfort in our simple Christian faith that when we, too, cross the borders of the unknown land we will find this true and loyal friend awaiting us.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 8687, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, conditions existing in our country today are such that we, the elected representatives of the people, should think long and well before we enact this legislation, which, from every indication, is already adding to the millions of unemployed industrial workers who are denied an opportunity of profitable employment.

Reports which I have received from workers' representatives in my district indicate that there are thousands of workers unemployed today who had a job the early part and up to the middle of February.

During the past 10 months Congress has appropriated and spent billions of dollars of the people's money in an effort to eliminate unemployment among our industrial workers and to relieve distress among our agricultural workers.

Congress has decreed, through the N.R.A. and the three A.'s, that industrial workers shall not be employed for more than 40 hours per week and that farmers shall curtail their production; that children shall not be employed in mills and factories.

Despite these measures we still have some ten or eleven millions of industrial workers unemployed, and we still have among our farming population many hundreds of thousands who are still in need of help.

We are now asked to pass a bill the very nature of which will eliminate the benefits which we have hoped for through the enactment of the legislation to which I have just referred.

Is it possible that any Member of this House expects the South American or Central American farmers to curtail their production as a result of any reciprocal trade treaty into which we may be inveigled?

Is there any Member of this House who expects that European or Asiatic countries will establish the 40-hour work week for their workers and eliminate child labor as a result of any reciprocal trade treaty to which the officials of our State Department may agree?

The answer is obviously "no." Yet the Members of this House are asked to enact this legislation and authorize the officials of the State Department to enter into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign governments whereby the products of the farms and the factories of those countries will be delivered into our American market at total delivered costs which are less than American costs of production.

The Committee on Labor has unanimously reported a 30-hour work week bill with the same wages to be paid for the 30 hours' work as the workers now receive for 40 or more hours per week. The Committee on Labor expects this bill to pass the House within the next few weeks and to become a law at this session, as, it is conceded by all fair-minded persons, it is only through the enactment of such legislation will it be possible to find employment for our ten or eleven millions of unemployed workers.

The Congress has passed legislation through which we have forced the curtailment of production on the part of American farmers, and we have placed a processing, or, better said, a consumers' tax on the products of the farm, to be paid by the millions of our industrial workers to recompense the American farmers for the acreage which they have withdrawn from production. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that no representatives of the industrial workers have protested or opposed the placing of this processing or consumers' tax for the benefit of the farmers.

The reason for the cooperation of the industrial workers and the farmers is obvious. Their interests are common. One cannot be prosperous without the other being prosperous, and personally I rejoice to see them working in harmony with one another.

The employed industrial workers constitute the backbone of the market which consumes the products produced on the farms. The purchasing power of the American farmers makes possible the employment of our millions of industrial workers.

When we enact legislation which will bring back prosperity to the industrial workers and the farmers of our country, the rest of our people will be better able to care for themselves.

Personally, I have voted for all this legislation, as I believe it is the duty of the Congress particularly to look after the affairs of our industrial workers and our farmers. They constitute the backbone of our population.

No Member of this House will charge me with voting on a sectional basis.

Therefore, I feel free to point out to my friends in the House, and, especially to the members of my own party, the dangers which confront the people of our country and especially those representing the Democratic Party, if we should pass this bill.

This bill, even while under consideration in the House and before the Ways and Means Committee, has resulted in depriving hundreds of thousands of industrial workers of an opportunity of a job.

There are few, if any, factory owners who will provide employment for industrial workers, on products which are ordered for delivery, say 3 or 6 months ahead, while serious consideration is given to the passage of this pending bill. Should this bill be enacted into law, I doubt if any factory owner will produce anything except those goods which have a ready market and which do not have to meet the competition of foreign-made goods until he has received definite assurances that foreign articles, comparable to his production, will not be sold at prices below his costs of production.

Even were the factory owners willing to take a chance, they would not be able to do so. Almost every factory owner is more or less dependent upon the credit which he secures from the banks. It is common knowledge that credit is scarce at the present time, and, with this legislation under serious consideration, there are but few banks which will extend credit to the factory owners for the production of any merchandise, unless that merchandise will be paid for within the next few months.

Of course, the smaller producers, who have a limited credit with the banks, will be hit harder than will those large corporations, who, through agreements among themselves, and, through the suspension of the antitrust laws, practically constitute a monopoly.

Reports which I have received from my own district, from Lawrence where some of the finest cotton and woolen goods are produced, from Lynn where the finest shoes in the world are produced, from Peabody and Salem where some of the finest leathers in America are produced—to name but a few of the industries located in my district—indicate that since the middle of February, when it was definitely made known that this legislation would be insisted upon, many thousands of industrial workers have been laid off with no intimation of when they would be again reemployed.

That which is true of my district is likewise true of industrial conditions in other sections of New England, in New York, in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, and sections of the Middle West.

Mr. Chairman, I can recall as a boy when the entire New England States were represented by one lone Democratic Congressman. I can recall the time not many years ago when the Democratic Party of New England did not have a representative in the Senate of the United States.

Those who made possible the growth of the Democratic Party in New England fought for principles. They believed in the principles of Jefferson. They believed that the Democratic Party was the party of the common people and not the party of class or privilege. Finally, after years of sacrifice and education, the seeds which they well planted came to life, and today we find the Democratic Party of New England represented in this House by 12 Members out of a total of 31. In the Senate the Democrats of New England are represented by 4 Members of a total of 12. In the 6 New England States we have our four largest States presided over by Democratic executives.

Next November the people of New England will vote for 6 Members of the Senate and 31 Members of the House.

Their verdict will be registered largely upon the record of this Congress, and, I regret to say, the decision of the Congress on this bill will have a large influence in the coming campaign of those States.

As one Member of the House I want to make my protest known against a policy wherein the Members of the House have been continually placed on the spot. So far as I have been able to learn, there is nothing definite known as to what will happen when this bill reaches the Senate.

If this bill should be enacted into law, which I hope will not happen, the Republican Party of New England will find many willing listeners to their plea for votes, I regret to say, among the unemployed industrial workers.

The workers of America want profitable employment and an opportunity to bring to their families sufficient wages each week to maintain decent standards of living. The farmers of America want a market for their products. Unless the industrial workers are employed and earning fair wages with which they can purchase the products of the farm, there can be no prosperity for the farmers.

What are the facts? The Tariff Commission recently submitted an exhaustive report to the Congress. This report shows that we, in America, consume more than 95 percent of the products which we produce each year. This report also shows that, here in America, we do more than one half of the trade of the entire world each year.

This report shows that there are but a few products which we export in any great quantity. They are cotton, of which we export about one half of that which we produce and with a foreign demand lessening each year. Wheat, of which we export less than 20 percent of what we produce. Tobacco, of which we export about one half of what we produce. Pork products, of which we export a percentage of what we produce. Copper, of which we have in the past exported some 20 percent of what we produced.

So far as our exports of copper go, the producers of American copper fully realize that they cannot continue to compete in the foreign market with the products of the near-slave labor of the Belgian Congo, with wages paid in the Belgian Congo, I am told, of some 5 cents per day.

Two years ago, to help relieve the distress among the copper miners and the copper producers of Arizona, New Mexico, Montana, Michigan, and other States, Congress placed an excise tax of 4 cents per pound on all imports of copper. Senator ASHURST, of Arizona, one of the leading Democrats of the Senate, only yesterday presented an amendment or announced that he would sponsor an amendment to this bill providing an import tax of 10 cents per pound on imports of copper, and, further, asked Congress to purchase all the available supply of copper in order to make possible the employment of workers in the copper mines of our country. I do not believe it necessary to remark that the American producers of copper are not looking for any foreign market for their products.

The Tariff Commission report shows that our exports of tobacco last year were sold at an average price of 18 cents per pound. The import duty on tobacco is 55 cents per pound. Does anyone expect that this duty will continue if we engage in the making of reciprocal trade treaties with foreign governments?

Personally, I do not believe that we need look for any foreign market to consume our surplus production of wheat and pork products. If the industrial workers were fully employed, at decent wages, I believe they will supply a better market for these products than we can find in any foreign country.

The one commodity for which it is essential that we have an export market is cotton.

One of the reasons for our present oversupply of cotton is the development of rayon. So far as I know, the principal rayon mills of our country are located in the Southern States. The foreign market for our cotton is, I am led to believe, fast diminishing.

At the present time the cotton planters of the Southland are forced to compete with the cheaper-produced cotton of the Asiatics.

This type of competition does not permit of the cotton planters of the South getting a fair price for their product. I am as much opposed to having the cotton planters of our country forced to compete with the intolerable near-slave conditions of the Asiatic countries as I am in having the industrial workers of New England forced to compete with the coolie labor of the Orient.

One of the great outlets for our cotton is Japan. It is to be expected that Japan will be one of the foreign nations with which we will be expected to enter into reciprocal trade relations. The one great ambition of Japan is the elimination on our part of the Asiatic Exclusion Act. The setting aside or, at least, the modification of that act will be demanded by Japan before she will agree to enter into any reciprocal trade treaty with us. This is not an idle dream, as those who read the Washington Merry-Go-Round may have noticed in the Washington Herald of Tuesday—yesterday—that Secretary of State Hull is credited with already arranging to ask for the repeal of the Asiatic Exclusion Act. Is it possible that the people of the Southland will tolerate such a surrender on our part even though it were possible to dump some of our surplus cotton in that country?

To my mind, the Congress of the United States, in fairness to the people of the South, realizing that the great basic product of the Southern States is cotton and, further, that we must have an export market for that one great commodity, should make it possible for the cotton planters of the South to secure a decent return for their product.

I believe that we would help the cotton planters and we would be acting in fairness to the entire American people if, instead of jeopardizing the success of the recovery program by passing this legislation, we enacted a law whereby the cotton planters would receive a bonus or a bounty of say 5 cents per pound for each pound of cotton which is exported to foreign countries. This bonus or bounty should be paid only to the cotton planters, not to the New York and Chicago speculating gamblers.

The greatest market in the world is the American market. The one market in the world for which the Congress can legislate is the American market. Let us legislate for America.

The American people are fair. All of the propaganda which can be or may be put forth claiming that this bill, when enacted into law, will help millions of industrial and agricultural workers, falls flat when we find in the recent exhaustive report of the Tariff Commission that less than 500,000 industrial and agricultural workers combined have been deprived of employment through the loss of our foreign trade. In other words, the complete recovery of the foreign trade, which we hear so much about, would provide employment for only 5 percent of our millions of unemployed.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the Members of the House will bear in mind that our exports are valued on a basis of American values, while all our imports are valued on the basis of value in the European or Asiatic countries whence they come.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill by the House will do more to retard the program of recovery instituted by our honored President than any one act I can think of. I sincerely hope that the Democratic Party will not make it possible for our Republican opponents to go before the American people and question the sincerity of our efforts to better the conditions of the great mass of the industrial and agricultural workers of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this bill indicates that the cleavage between those who favor the passage of the bill and those who oppose it goes deeper than the old sectional division between those who represent industrial sections to be benefited by a high tariff and those who represent agricultural sections that have never received any substantial benefits under the Republican policy of protective tariff. It goes to the heart of the fundamental issue of whether this Nation shall follow a course of isolation and endeavor to be economically self-contained or a policy of trading with the other nations of the world, sometimes referred to as the "internationalistic theory." In his very able discussion of the bill on last Friday, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] said:

The only conceivable future we can hope to face under the internationalistic theory is a reduction of American living standards to the level of that of the pauper-ridden countries of the Old World and the Far East.

I take issue with my distinguished colleague on that theory. I feel that our Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, more correctly summarized the situation when he stated before the National Press Club last month that "International trade is the lifeblood of civilization." In fact, on Monday one of the leaders of the Republican side disclaimed any intention on the part of the Republican leadership to commit this Nation to a policy of economic nationalism.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has ably pointed out that the constitutional point raised by the opponents of this bill is not well taken. And it may not be amiss to call attention to the fact in that connection that on almost every major measure of the new deal some Republican opponent has insisted that the measure was unconstitutional, yet none of these measures has as yet been declared unconstitutional by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Realizing that the power conferred upon the President to raise or lower existing tariff rates by 50 percent is the same power that was conferred by a Republican Congress upon a Republican President, certain opponents of the bill have based their main objection to it on the ground that the trade treaties to be negotiated by the President will not have to be confirmed by the Senate, and that, therefore, the Congress will be abdicating its rights and duties in the premises. To this, advocates of the bill have replied that there are precedents for the conferring of such power upon the President and that in any event the whole effectiveness of the proposal will be nullified if each trade treaty must be referred to the Senate for approval before it becomes effective. In the first place, it is not likely that many of the trade treaties could be negotiated prior to the adjournment of the present session of the Seventy-third Congress, and, therefore, all efforts on the part of the President to win back through the negotiation of reciprocal trade treaties some of our lost foreign commerce would have to be held in abeyance until Congress reconvened on January 3, 1935.

We have likewise had a recent illustration of the time it takes the Senate to dispose of a treaty, the Inland Waterways Treaty with Canada having been before the Senate for approximately 2 months before it was finally acted upon. Assuming that 2 months would be a fair time for senatorial action, the negotiation of even 20 trade treaties would require nearly 2 years of continuous consideration by the Senate before all of them could be made effective, if at all. It should, therefore, be apparent to all fair-minded men that the real issue involved is whether or not we shall trade with other nations or endeavor to be self-contained, and I feel that those who vote on this bill should squarely and frankly face that issue, and determine their support or opposition accordingly. If we are to be a self-contained nation, let us frankly face the fact that we are producing in the United States more cotton, wheat, tobacco, apples, and hogs than are now being consumed domestically, and more than ever will be consumed.

The Secretary of Agriculture said that to be self-contained we must eliminate from agriculture at least 40,000,000 acres of land, which, of course, will involve the transfer from farming to some other activity of three to four millions of farmers and farm laborers. Let us frankly face the fact that to be self-contained we must strictly regiment not only the cotton growers, as we propose to do under the Bankhead bill, but likewise the wheat growers, the tobacco growers, the apple growers, the hog growers—in fact, everything that is now produced on the farm. If we are to be self-contained, let us frankly face the fact that there will come inevitably conflict between the 30 millions now directly dependent for a livelihood upon agriculture and those who labor in our mills and factories. Should the income of our farmers be artificially raised to a level with the wages of organized labor, the tendency will be for the cost of living from that point to rise faster than wages.

We have already had a good illustration of what it costs the consumer to artificially raise the income of one small class of farmers, namely the beet farmers of the United States. The subsidy granted that farm industry by the Hawley-Smoot tariff is costing the consumers of the United States about $200,000,000 annually, an amount almost sufficient in any normal year to buy out the industry, lock, stock, and barrel, and likewise sufficient in any normal year to buy the entire acreage engaged in the raising of beet sugar at a valuation of $200 per acre. There are at the present time about 200,000 farmers and farm laborers engaged in raising sugar beets, and considerably less than that for the past 5-year average, and about 30,000 engaged in the beet-sugar mills. In the district in Virginia from which I was elected to the House, there are nearly 100,000 more people than the total number engaged in the beet-sugar industry, and six times as many acres as there were acres planted in sugar beets, even in the big year of 1933. No one has proposed under the pending bill to put the beet-sugar industry out of business, or to unduly hamper its present operation. All that has been contended is that it has been an expensive luxury and should not be further expanded at the expense of the general consumer. If instead of being scattered over 16 normally Republican States the beet-sugar industry had been confined to my district in Virginia, I have an idea that the Congress that framed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill would have given to beet sugar the same protection that it gave to Virginia pine pulpwood, namely, none at all.

The distinguished gentleman from Michigan (Mr. WOODRUFF) contended that the loss of our foreign markets for farm products was a natural and normal economic evolution. In the first place, the fact remains that this so-called "economic evolution" did not occur until after the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill and not until long after our best European markets had felt the full and devastating effect of the World War, which meant for so many of them poverty and suffering. It was freely admitted by the European delegates to the London Economic Conference of last June that the policy adopted by the United States in the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff had forced the nations with which we formerly traded to adopt trade barriers in self-protection. Had we held our 1929 ratio of world trade we would have exported $700,000,000 more than we did in 1932. Take the case of France, for instance. The impetus for the extreme nationalistic spirit in France was undoubtedly given by our high protective policy. All our farm exports to France after the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff fell off tremendously; the export of apples to France declined as much as 52 percent. France placed a tariff of $1.75 per bushel against our wheat and urged French farmers to produce enough wheat to feed the nation. That certainly was no economic evolution. I do not know the exact tariff that France placed upon our beef, but I do know that last summer the cheapest cuts of beef sold in Paris at 30 cents per pound, and beefsteak at $1.25 per pound, while our markets were so glutted with a surplus of beef that our farmers could scarcely realize 2 cents per pound for prime steers. What was the result of this policy of economic nationalism in France? Living costs went up faster than wages and there were constant labor strikes and industrial troubles. The price of wheat and other farm commodities went so high there was a buyer strike, and the farmers who had been encouraged to raise more and more wheat had it on their hands without a market. A ministry fell on January 31, 1933, another fell on October 20, 1933, another on November 24, 1933, another on January 30, 1934, and another on February 8, 1934.

When the French delegates reached the London Economic Conference, they appealed for some international agreement and a quota system on wheat to relieve France of the disastrous effect of its efforts at being self-contained, but Australia was unwilling to make concessions, Argentina was unwilling to make concessions, since these countries, like the United States, had conceived the bright idea that they could continue to sell to other countries but not continue to buy. We can learn something from France with respect to unsound money. We can learn something from France with respect to economic nationalism. Should we ever adopt such a policy in this country, we can expect class warfare and disastrous consequences.

I do not believe in artificially raising the necessities of life that come from the farm above the ability of the average consumer to buy; I do not believe in the regimentation of our farmers as a permanent and continuing policy; I do not believe that we have any right to say to some 3,000,000 farmers: "You can no longer engage in that type of making a livelihood for which you are best qualified by both inheritance and training and which you prefer." It is not our gothams but our rural sections where we find that strongest allegiance to our established institutions and where we find best exemplified the sterling qualities of character that are so essential to the perpetuity of a nation.

Both the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] express the belief that our foreign markets are irretrievably lost and that we will never supplant those nations that now have the foreign trade that we once enjoyed. I think I can demonstrate to you the fallacy of that with respect to the export of just one farm commodity—apples. Our State Department negotiated its first trade treaty with France in connection with the importation of French wines.

Prior to the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff not a single nation had erected trade barriers against American apples, and our normal export of apples amounted to an average of 21,000,000 bushels per year, which was 20 percent of our commercial crop and about 50 percent of the commercial crop in the district I represent. The principal apple-exporting States are Washington, Oregon, California, Montana, and Idaho in the West; and Virginia, West Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and New York in the East. The 5-year average up to 1932 of the value of export apples was $28,362,052, which meant 100,000 carloads of freight and 100,000 carloads for trucks. It may surprise some to learn that the export value of apples ranked next to wheat and cotton and thirteenth in the list of all commodities exported by the United States. What happened when other nations of the world decided to retaliate against the United States? Did they buy their apples from other countries? Impossible, because it takes from 12 to 15 years to bring an orchard into bearing; and yet our exports for the 1932-33 year fell off 33 percent; 38 percent in the British markets, our best customer, and 52 percent in France. And then, as I have said above, the State Department negotiated one trade treaty with France whereby France agreed to accept 20,000 metric tons of apples in return for the privilege of shipping us wines that the citizens of the United States seemed very much to want, and the importation of which, to some measure, prevented local producers of wine from gouging the public.

Under this arrangement we promptly shipped to France 1,160,000 bushels of apples, and the price at port, which had been about a dollar a box, doubled. That was more apples than we had ever shipped to France during any similar period, and France has since agreed to accept an additional 5,000 tons. The apples shipped to France did not, as one speaker has contended, lie on the docks and rot. A few French importers failed to procure the required Government certificate for the importation of American apples and they had some difficulty in disposing of them. A few of these may have rotted on the docks, but most were reshipped to other countries. It is true that after entering into this agreement with us France boosted her tariff on apples from 30 francs per quintal, which is about 4 bushels, to 125 francs, but this tariff rate was maintained only 1 week, when the original tariff of 30 francs was restored.

Gentlemen have asked how the President would use the powers to be conferred upon him by this bill. I answer that there is a $38,000,000 export business in apples that will be in great distress without foreign markets, and if the apples of the eastern and far-western export States can only be sold in our domestic markets the Midwestern States that produce primarily for home consumption will find their markets ruined.

The Democratic platform, upon which the Democratic Members of this House were elected, advocated reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations, and this is our opportunity to carry out that platform pledge. Our President is committed to a competitive tariff policy, and therefore no Republican Member of this House has the right to assume that he will negotiate a trade agreement that would admit foreign goods on an unfair noncompetitive basis. And the representatives in this body of industry should realize that the farmer is industry's best customer. If the farmer cannot sell his surplus crops abroad, he cannot purchase the products of industry; and when the farmer cannot purchase, unemployment in industry commences and a general stagnation, such as we have witnessed for the past 3 years under our policy of isolation, results. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have tried to approach the problems involved in this proposed legislation from the standpoint of the general effect upon the country and then from the narrower view, the effect upon the district which I represent. I am frank to say that there are industrialists in my district who are in favor of this legislation, and they approach it from the standpoint of the possibility of reciprocal trade agreements. In viewing the question as to how I should vote on the proposal I have had in mind the suggestions which I have received from these same industrialists, some of whom are Republicans, to determine if in the larger aspects the benefits that they may derive—and I concede there are some—will outweigh the disadvantages. In this connection I was very favorably impressed with the remark made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL] when he said that under no circumstances did he want to intrust to the traditional enemies of tariff in this country the administration of an act which might under the most favorable circumstances mean doubt and uncertainty for every industry in the country. On the basis of the general effect of legislation of this character I have determined to vote against it.

I favor the idea of reciprocity. The possibility of tariff reductions in certain schedules even to the extent of 50 percent through reciprocal trade agreements does not alarm me in the least. I am not so deeply concerned about the constitutional phases of this legislation, but it occurs to me that when we pass a bill of this kind we strike at the very heart of the recovery program, because there is nothing that strikes terror to the hearts of human individuals more than uncertainty and doubt. This is exactly the way you are going to leave industry in this country when you pass a piece of legislation of this kind.

When you deal with industry you are dealing with individuals. The owners of a factory are not the only individuals involved. The laborers who man the plant and the producers of the raw material that are required to make the finished product, the citizens of the community dependent for their very existence upon such an industry are the subjects of the harmful effects of legislation which defines no policies, follows no principles, and leaves only doubt and uncertainty in its wake. Where in this entire debate can you show me a person who has dared to explain what product of the American farm or factory is to go on the bargain counter to be traded for foreign importations. That remains a secret locked in the bosom of men who have indicated by their utterances that they propose to trade away any industry which they have seen fit to label as inefficient. Cheese and sugar are two products of the American farmers which have been mentioned as inefficiently produced in America, and presumably they have been marked for slaughter if these men are invested with the authority to enter into trade agreements with foreign countries.

Let me at this point insert portions of a letter I received on this subject:

The competition which is working against manufacturers of wood-slat porch shades in the United States and which may eventually put us all out of business unless it is stopped, is the competition brought about by the importation from Japan of what is known as "wide-slat painted bamboo porch shades." These porch shades are imported by various importers.

Dealers inform us that they are being quoted by Wolf-Galluspan & Sons, 682-688 Grand Street, Brooklyn, N.Y., on wide-slat painted bamboo porch shades, which look very, very much like our porch shades and are made in the same way and painted in the same color, a price of $1.60 for a porch shade 6 feet wide with a drop of 6 feet 8 inches, while we are obliged to get, in order to pay the wages we pay, the price we pay for lumber, cord, twine, taxes, etc., included in the cost of manufacturing our porch shades, $3.88 for our porch shade woven 6 feet wide with a drop of 7 feet. That is, merchants can buy imported bamboo porch shades, wide slat, the style we make, painted green, the style we also make, of the above firm for $1.60; and these importers get these bamboo shades in Japan, pay the freight from Japan, pay the present high import duty, and still sell them for $1.60 to the stores in the United States in competition with us who are obliged to get $3.88; and I will frankly state that there is very serious doubt whether the price we get for them, $3.88, will cover the cost of the shades to us this year.

Would it be fair to say that because Japan can produce a shade at a cheaper price than it can be produced in America under American conditions and by free American labor that this industry should be wiped out? This is not an isolated case. It is typical of thousands of American products, and yet we are asked to blindfold ourselves and vote industry into the uncertain position where they may be wiped out of existence by the stroke of the pen and without so much as a hearing. In the face of the President's recent request that industry increase employment and increase wages you now propose to these same industries now in competition with foreign manufacturers that they may at any time be face to face with a reduction in what tariff protection they now have. My contention is that you block recovery with any such proposal; I repeat that doubt and fear and uncertainty of the future will lead industry to contract rather than expand their activities, all of which decreases employment and purchasing power.

Without destroying the effectiveness of a reciprocal tariff bill the right to a hearing could be added, and the policy upon which the treaties are to be based could be defined. Labor, industry, and our farmers have a right to be heard; they have a right to protect their interests, and I do not propose to vote for any measure which is inimical to their interests and clearly contrary to American ideas and ideals.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 11 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in order to understand what this bill really means and the motives back of it, one has only to bear in mind the extensive tariff powers which Congress has already given the President and the form in which they have been granted. From much of the discussion of the last 3 days one might gather that under present law the President is estopped from taking any quick action on the tariff in response to rapidly changing conditions throughout the world. I want to remind you that such is not the case, that Congress has by a series of acts given the President a large measure of authority to make changes in the tariff by Executive order and that these grants of authority are still valid and at his disposal. The essential point which distinguishes the powers already given him from the power which the President's advisers are now asking for, is that Congress hitherto has always formulated the general principles and fixed the general rules under which he can act, and that now his advisers want all of these rules and principles abrogated. What they want is unrestricted power given him to manipulate the tariff according to their own notions without the interference of any check or guidance. It is only when you realize this fact that you can grasp the full significance of what the President's advisers are now demanding in this bill.

For the purpose of clarifying this statement, let me instance some of the powers over the tariff which we have liberally given the President, and point out how in each case Congress has named the conditions and determined the policy under which he should exercise them.

First. In the so-called "flexible clause" of the Tariff Act of 1930, Congress gave the President the right to raise or lower customs duties by as much as 50 percent in either direction. But in that measure Congress at the same time established two rules to control his action. He could decree such changes in the tariff only for the purpose of equalizing domestic and foreign costs of production, and these changes must have the recommendation of the body of experts, of his own appointing, known as the "Tariff Commission." It may be worth recalling that only twice has he taken advantage of this right to increase duties, while on four occasions he has used it to reduce them.

Second. In the same act Congress gave him further power to make changes in the tariff. It provided that whenever he found that the foreign production or export of any dutiable commodity was being directly or indirectly subsidized he was to decree countervailing duties upon the imports affected. Congress in this case ordered the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate and ascertain to what extent foreign governments were aiding, either the export or the production of commodities coming into this country, and he was then to levy additional corresponding duties upon their import. It should be noted that although this was a grant of power for the protection of American undertakings against unfair foreign competition, there is no evidence whatever that the present administration has made any endeavor to follow the instructions of Congress in this regard. It has never sought to ascertain which foreign industries or how far such industries are being subsidized, and it follows that it has never levied any countervailing duties.

Third. Under the act of last year which established the N.R.A., Congress gave the President greater authority over the tariff than had even been given a Chief Executive before, and again Congress named the conditions for its application. He was given blanket powers to fix the terms and fees for the entry of commodities, wherever rising costs of production in America, due to the N.R.A. codes, caused danger of foreign competition. Congress authorized him for this purpose not only to change the customs dues by Executive order, it authorized him to transfer articles from the free to the dutiable list; it authorized him even to declare embargoes.

Here also it must be observed that the President and his advisers have not given the slightest indication of any intention to use this power. American industry is now operating under innumerable codes throughout the country. Under them, the hours of labor have been reduced and the wages of labor have been increased. The American costs of production have been heavily raised, and the domestic level of prices is surging upward. Competing foreign producers have inevitably been benefited not only because increasing domestic costs hinder our export trade but because they help foreigners to undersell us in our own markets.

Yet, although the situation would justify the President's use of the power that Congress gave him for the protection of American industry and of American labor from the conditions brought about by the codes, and which are clearly advantageous to foreign competitors, he and his advisers have not seen fit to exercise it.

Instead of using the powers they already have the Presidential advisers come before us today urging that we yield them still further control over the tariff. They apparently are not much interested in the opportunity to use the tariff to protect American industry against changing comparative costs of production. They are not concerned about the effect of subsidies to foreign competitors upon American business and employment. They are not perturbed by the benefits which our codes confer upon these foreign competitors. They seem to be interested in only one aspect of the tariff, and that is how they can lower it so as to enlarge our imports from abroad and make foreigners more prosperous. They have a theory about the tariff which is as obscure and round-about as many of the other theories that have been tried upon our long-suffering people during the past year—that if they can make foreigners more prosperous, even at the expense of some of our own industries and workers, then other of our industries and workers may reap a gain through the greater sale of their goods to the foreigners whom we have thus endowed. They want the power, therefore, through tariff manipulation to trade one industry in this country for another. They want the power to sacrifice certain American businesses which they consider unimportant for the benefit of other businesses which they think more worthy of preservation. They want to be able to arrange these swappings by secret Executive action, without giving any of those who are about to be sacrificed an opportunity to appear and present their case. They want to be able to deal with every American industry as arbitrarily as they recently dealt with the aviation industry when they canceled the air-mail contracts without warning or hearing. They want to be able to withdraw all Government aid or protection, wherever it may exist, without any previous notice and without extending a chance to be heard to those for whom such action may be a matter of economic life or death. They want this power to be given them unhampered by any prescribed rules or principles of guidance, without the necessity of any previous investigation or recommendation by the Tariff Commission, and without any possibility of subsequent rectification by the House or the Senate.

If there is any conceivable measure that would create greater uncertainty and instability in our economic life than this proposal, I must confess that I do not know what it might be. To many of us it has seemed doubtful for some time whether the ingenuity of theorists could devise any more effective means for upsetting business recovery than certain of the experiments already tried during the past year, but we have here in this bill exactly such a proposal.

Mr. Chairman, this is indeed the climax of the governmental policy initiated a year ago. On the 11th of last March Congress unwittingly took the first of a series of steps which have led consistently and inevitably to the bill before us. On that day, acceding to the insistent request of the President, Congress, without realizing what was to follow, voted to give him unheard-of power over the expenditures of the Government, including the compensation of our war veterans and the pay of our Government employees. Then Congress gave him and his advisers almost limitless power to experiment as they saw fit with our monetary system. Congress followed that by giving them like power to experiment with almost every branch of agriculture. As if that did not offer sufficient scope for the innovating spirit, Congress next turned over to them the management of every industry, large and small, in the country, with power to determine their wages and hours of labor, power to fix their prices, even power to control their output. By a series of other measures Congress put at their disposal vast authority and vast amounts of money, which has enabled them to displace private industry in many lines through heavily endowed Government projects. There remained, however, one field of control which Congress had not relinquished. It has turned over to the President and his experts control of all domestic trade and industry, but it had reserved some measure of power to regulate our commerce with foreign nations. The bill before us is an attempt to fill that gap and complete our abdication. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am glad of this opportunity to add my views to the marathon of words on this highly important issue, but due to the limited time, I will confine myself to a discussion of the tariff bill in relation to our representative form of Government and the Constitution of the United States. We Republicans are content with the Federal Constitution as it is and under which we have developed into the greatest and freest nation on earth. We only ask that it be administered in the spirit of its framers and that its privileges and blessings be preserved for the benefit and welfare of the American people of our own generation and generations yet to come.

The Republican party stands where it always has stood—the supporters of the Constitution as our fathers gave it to us. It still stands as the sworn friend of the Constitution and the sworn foe of its enemies.

The disastrous defeat of the Republican Party in 1932 left but a small number of us in the House of Representatives to carry on sound Republican principles. Although somewhat dazed by the extent of our losses we were not disheartened, knowing well the incapacity of the Democrats to function as a national party and to keep within bounds of reason and govern with moderation.

The President has established a new form of government. He leans but little on his Cabinet or on Congress. The real government consists of a kitchen cabinet of professors, radicals, and near Socialists. Many of them are admirers of the system of government in Soviet Russia, and are bending their efforts and energies to bring about an approach to that system in America.

President Roosevelt evidently is not concerned with either the Constitution or our representative form of government, or he would not have asked for unlimited powers to make reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations. The request in itself is unworthy of the President, and must be another "brain trust" proposal entered into without mature consideration. I would have no objection to giving that power to a nonpartisan Tariff Commission, provided it could report back to the Congress for final approval. I would favor such a policy in dealing with Canada, Mexico, and Central and South America. We should be willing to make trade concessions to these countries which are our natural markets.

The President, in his recent N.R.A. speech, used these words:

The real truth of the matter is that for a number of years in our country the machinery of democracy had failed to function.

The President is not helping to uphold our American ideals and traditions by joining the hue and cry and carping criticisms both from within and from without our country against our free institutions.

The hardest blow ever dealt our democratic system of government is the request he has made on the Congress to abdicate its constitutional powers to enact tariff legislation which includes the taxing power.

The conferring upon the President the right to make trade agreements without the final sanction of Congress is not only unconstitutional but is an outright betrayal of our representative form of government. It amounts to an open admission by Congress that, after 145 years of dealing with tariff legislation, it is now incompetent and unfit to legislate properly, intelligently, and in the public interest. We are called upon to violate our oath of office to uphold the Constitution and betray our duties as representatives of the people by abjectly surrendering our taxing powers, the main reason for the existence of the House of Representatives, to the President. When we do that we become nothing more than rubber stamps. We have already provided for a 59-cent rubber dollar, and now we are asked to rubberize the Constitution of the United States.

For a number of years Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler have been making public statements about the dismal failure of democracy, and particularly of the failure of parliamentary or representative government to function. They need no longer laugh up their sleeves, but if this bill passes they will cry out from the housetops the doom of democracy. What a travesty, without rime or reason or any emergency except a manufactured one it would be for Members of Congress to abdicate their main powers and functions and help to destroy the usefulness of Congress and our legislative system of government. To me it is a tragedy far beyond the merits or demerits of the pending legislation.

Both my father and grandfather, of the same name, served in this House, and no President, no matter what party he belongs to, can persuade or coerce me to betray my trust and help destroy our representative system of government which in the past has been the pride and glory of free men and of a mighty Republic. [Applause.]

My fellow Members, why sacrifice that which has been tried in the darkest days of the Civil War and in the midst of a World War to turn from our representative and legislative form of government to giving dictatorial powers to the Chief Executive? He holds no mandate from the American people to destroy American industries and the American market for goods produced by our own wage earners. Up to recently the United States has been the greatest free-trade country within its own boundaries in the world. However, this administration, by the use of subsidies and processing taxes on cotton and foodstuffs, has virtually imposed heavy duties on the American people for purchasing their own goods and mirabile dictu now proposes, through reciprocal trade agreements to show favoritism to the goods produced by cheap foreign labor in Europe, China, and Japan.

The Republican Party believes in maintaining the American market for our own producers and laborers. When we depart from that well-recognized policy of affording adequate protection to our own industries and wage earners it means smokeless factories and millions of more unemployed. What we need is more protection in these trying times, not less. Under Republican administrations for over 60 years the American people have been the best paid, the best housed, the best fed, and the best clothed, and the most contented in the world.

It is well to remember that the Republican Party under a protective tariff system gave the American people from 1921-29, the greatest degree of prosperity ever known in any country in the history of the world. It is not the fault of the Republican Party if the people were wasteful and extravagant, and abused the overabundance or surplus of prosperity we gave them and led on by the big international bankers went money mad and tried to get rich overnight by joining in an orgy of speculation and gambling.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from New York voted in 1922 and again in 1930, if I am not mistaken, for reciprocal trade agreements, and is it not a further fact that the gentleman voted with me for the Tariff Commission?

Mr. FISH. I just stated I would favor a nonpartisan Tariff Commission to investigate and report back to the Congress of the United States for final action. When we surrender our tariff-making power under the provisions of the pending bill we surrender it entirely. I favor also reciprocal trade agreements particularly to promote the export of our agricultural surplus provided such agreements would be submitted to Congress for approval.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5½ additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. There is no provision whatsoever in this legislation for hearings, and the American manufacturer will be absolutely at the mercy of the whims of one man or a small group of men whom the President may designate.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows that it is not the policy of the Democratic Party to allow hearings. This was proven in the air-mail controversy. [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry. I cannot yield further.

Thomas Jefferson would turn in his grave at the thought of transferring such autocratic and despotic taxing powers to the Chief Executive. Where are the constitutional and Jeffersonian Democrats in this contest against an economic dictatorship? If they vote for this bill, it must be in open violation of every principle of Jeffersonian Democracy. If they vote for this bill, it is a plea of confession and avoidance. They must confess to their constituents back home that as a party or individually they are not qualified to legislate or to act in a representative capacity in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and in order to avoid the natural consequences of their incompetence must turn the entire tariff powers over to the President and the "brain trust."

What will be the logical answer of the people back home? "We sent you to Washington to look after our interests and to legislate intelligently and not to abdicate your constitutional powers and set up an economic dictatorship. If you are either unable or unwilling to perform your constitutional legislative duties why we will look around and get some one who will."

I do not seek the defeat of my colleagues, but the price of betraying their trust as representatives of the people back home warrants defeat at their hands. Has the flame of liberty burned so low that Members of Congress can betray the constitutional rights of a free people by turning the taxing power over to the Chief Executive without a remonstrance? Have the memorable contests and oratory of John Hampden in England, Mirabeau in France, and James Otis and Patrick Henry in our own country against taxation without parliamentary representation been all in vain? As James Otis pointed out, this principle caused one English King to lose his head and another to lose his crown, and he might have added it also caused the American Revolution. Must we again revive this age-old fight? There is no alternative if this tariff bill is enacted into law.

The next national campaign will then have to decide as between the restoration of our American representative form of government and a socialistic dictatorship. On that issue of Americanism against socialism there can be only one answer, no matter what other issues are injected into the campaign.

What is needed badly at this juncture of our economic life, when business is at a low ebb and struggling to work its way out of a lengthy depression, is sound common sense, and there seems to be little of it.

What is really needed is a restoration of business confidence in order to turn the wheels of industry and provide employment. However, business, instead of being encouraged is discouraged at every turn by new shackles imposed by the "brain trust" and by doubts and uncertainties engendered by the proposed tariff bill.

What is needed is the restoration of individual effort and initiative which made our country the greatest, richest, and freest republic in the world.

Instead, the "brain trust" promotes collectivism and regimentation and rushes from one socialistic experiment to another. The Republican Party must not remain supine any longer. We must not look backward; economic conditions have changed. We must go forward on a sound liberal platform in favor of a square deal for both capital and labor. We must stand as we have always stood, against state socialism and for the Federal Constitution as the rock upon which our constitutional liberties and republican form of government is founded. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, although I have had more experience with the tariff subject matter than any other subject in my public work, I confess that I rise to address you this morning with little feeling of adequacy to the subject and the occasion. May I say in beginning that I shall not address myself to the philosophy of the tariff as a commercial or as an industrial policy, but should like to direct your attention specifically to methods in tariff making.

THE GENERAL POLICY

The first question, obviously, which a political party in Congress has to determine in approaching the subject of the tariff is the general policy which it intends to apply. May I say that as to determining the general policy itself I believe no body—certainly no other public body—in the United States would offer the same competency in making a wise decision on the general principle.

Having decided its general policy, it then must determine its methods of application of that policy to the subject matter, namely, the articles of commerce. In the existing law the general policy proclaimed is the imposition upon articles requiring it of a protective duty sufficient to measure the difference in cost of production between its domestic and foreign manufacture. The object, obviously, is to place the domestic manufacturer on the same terms of equality with regard to the foreigner that he enjoys with regard to his domestic rival.

The idea of the difference in cost has two objectives. The tariff should not be too high, having effected the purpose of protection to the domestic manufacturer, because the protectionists of the country are consumers as well as protectionists, and it was realized that in imposing this tariff they were imposing a sales tax on American consumers of the products, a sales tax collected, when the tariff is effective, not only from the foreign articles consumed but in effect from the competing domestic product as well.

This, then, is the general policy declared in the existing law. I shall accept this policy as the basis in discussing methods.

CATALOGING THE ARTICLES

Now, in order to apply this principle in determining the tariff rates, obviously, the first thing the Congress would need to know is the nature of the subject matter—that is, what are the articles involved? It must first catalog the articles in order to determine the rates which should be applied to them, and having cataloged the articles satisfactorily, it must then determine whether the articles are produced in the United States and are therefore subjects of possibly injurious foreign competition. The articles may not, perhaps, be produced in the United States and so no protective-tariff policy would be involved at all.

But the tariff is not one thing, not ten things, not a thousand things, not ten thousand things—do not smile at the statement, it is deliberately made—the tariff is not even limited to one hundred thousand things, when applied to our articles of commerce.

Let me give you a visual illustration. Here is a familiar Sears, Roebuck catalog. You are all familiar with its character and its contents. How many articles do you suppose there are in a Sears, Roebuck catalog? They run about 20,000. Only omniscience itself, it is obvious, could determine the differences in cost of production here and abroad of its articles or apply any other protective rule to them upon which the congressional mind might agree. There are over 20,000 articles of differing prices, and so of varying costs, in a Sears, Roebuck catalog alone. The Tariff Commission, in its reports, refers to the gross number of different articles of commerce in these words, "The almost countless articles of commerce."

TESTS IN APPLICATION

Having cataloged these articles, it would next be necessary to apply certain tests, say, first: Are these articles produced here in the United States? If so, then a second test: Are the articles produced here in quantities sufficient for our needs? For if an article were, like wool, of which we produce about one half of our needs, and where the imposition of such tariff sales tax would apply to all the consumed products, whether foreign or domestic in character, the Congress might conclude that such a burden upon the consuming American public was not justified by the protective policy, and would decline to make such an application.

There are other tests also that the rate maker would find it desirable to apply. I do not have time to discuss them now.

NO CATALOG MADE

Has any Congress even undertaken to so catalog the articles, to identify the articles, as to which these tariff rates have been applied? The answer is that Congress never has done it, and would have great difficulty in doing it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us be frank with ourselves. In all the history of tariff making in this body, during our lifetimes, can we fairly say that any body of men, whether gathered from the party of Abraham Lincoln or the party of Thomas Jefferson, could assume or pretend to possess the knowledge of the articles concerned absolutely essential to doing justice to the commerce involved, to the domestic manufacturers involved, and to the consumers who must bear the ultimate burden?

In default of such knowledge what then has Congress done in applying its policy—Republican or Democratic—to this subject matter. They have not cataloged the articles.

BASKET OR CATCH-ALL CLAUSES

What has been their method of treatment? Well, they have noticed about 3,000 articles only, the more familiar articles of human use, which are now named in the tariff act, and as to other articles said to be almost countless, what has happened? Well, they resorted to catch-all clauses. Let me give you some examples.

Look at this catalog of chemical glassware—paragraph 218 (a) of the act. It has thousands of different articles, all bearing the same rate of 85 percent, without regard to their differences, even when they are not produced in the United States.

Here is another such catalog of scientific instruments. It contains upward of 5,000 items. Paragraph 360 of the present tariff act imposes on them all a duty of 40 percent, with the single words of description "Scientific articles, instruments, and apparatus." I make the declaration deliberately, that the probabilities are that of all the thousands of articles in that catalog not one of them ever came into the consciousness of any single Member of Congress when they were imposing these rates. Gentlemen, that is not rate making; that is anarchy. It is utterly impossible that such rates can be rational under any principle of protective policy that might be devised.

Now please observe this catalog, "Surgical Instruments", under the catch-all clause of paragraph 359. The number of articles in this catalog of about 1,000 pages are estimated to reach from ten to fifteen thousand, yet you have one single rate of 55 percent in the tariff act applicable indiscriminately to all. Yet it is well known that we have to import 90 percent of our hard-steel surgical instruments because they are not made here. The soft-steel surgical instruments we do make and their mass production permits them to take an export character besides. Even the sick were overlooked in this catch-all clause.

Here is another catalog of about 700 pages, which comes under the catch-all clause applied to metal cutting tools. Certainly, none of these could have come into the consciousness of this body in determining rates; and yet there are thousands of them, and the same rate of 50 percent is applied indiscriminately to them.

Take the porcelain catch-all clause. It carries thousands of different articles of porcelain of different prices, cost, and characteristics, all at one rate. Blown-glass tableware is another example, with a 60-percent rate. This catalog also carries thousands of different articles.

Observe now this swelling catalog of more than 500 pages with thousands of articles falling under the catch-all clause of paragraph 360 at 40 percent, namely, chemical and industrial laboratory apparatus.

Probably a hundred such catalogs could be exhibited, but I shall only ask you to note at this time catalogs on "Musical instruments", with its 176 pages, falling under paragraph 1541, and its catch-all clause, "Musical instruments." Also a catalog of 540 pages, estimated to contain 4,000 articles, which fall under the catch-all clause "Drawing instruments", with a 45-percent rate; and, finally, this catalog carrying from 3,000 to 4,000 articles at 35 percent, falling under the catch-all clause "Dental instruments", paragraph 359.

The use of these catch-all clauses is found in all the schedules of the tariff act. I have counted some 264 of them.

Some of the fundamental necessities are thus recklessly treated; for example—

Paragraph 917. Underwear and all other wearing apparel of cotton or fiber, machine or hand knitted, n.s.p.f., 45 percent.

Paragraph 923. All articles made from cotton cloth, n.s.p.f., 40 percent.

Paragraph 1017. Clothing and articles of wearing apparel of every description made of vegetable fiber other than cotton, n.s.p.f., 35 percent.

Paragraph 1120. Wool, all manufactures of, n.s.p.f., 50 percent.

Paragraph 1211. Silks, all manufactures of, n.s.p.f., 65 percent.

Paragraph 1531. Manufactures of leather, parchment, rawhide, n.s.p.f., 35 percent.

Paragraph 1536. Manufactures of amber, bladder, or wax, n.s.p.f., 20 percent.

Paragraph 1537. Manufactures of bone, chip, horn, quills, whalebone, grass, straw, weeds, india rubber, palm leaf, n.s.p.f., 25 percent.

Paragraph 1538. Manufactures of ivory, vegetable ivory, mother-of-pearl, shell, plaster of paris, and hard rubber, n.s.p.f., 35 percent.

Paragraph 1552. And all smokers' articles whatsoever, n.s.p.f., 60 percent.

Paragraph 1558. All articles manufactured, in whole or in part, 20 percent.

May I say, without offense, that men who are willing, in a body like this, to subject their country's commerce and consumers to a disposition as reckless as these catch-all methods are not showing the responsibility in public matters which we know we can expect from them in individual affairs.

BLIND TARIFF RATE MAKING

Mr. Chairman, what is to be expected under such lack of method in applying a protective policy? Well, not only have prohibitive rates resulted from the sales taxes thus imposed without any knowledge of their application upon the part of congressional rate makers. I have a list compiled, which I shall also insert in my remarks, showing some 600 articles by name, equal to about one fifth of those named in the tariff act, where the rate exceeds 50 percent and rises in some instances to 300 percent. Indeed, there are applications of this blind tariff rate making where the rate has mounted to over 2,000 percent. Besides, literally thousands of articles not made in the United States at all are also subjected to the rates. I shall insert in my remarks a list of more than 250 of such articles by name.

PROTECTIVE RATES ON ARTICLES NOT PRODUCED IN UNITED STATES

May I cite a few examples which have come to my notice arising under the tariff on scientific instruments. Some time ago I, myself, desired to secure an electrical measuring instrument, which on inquiry was found not to be produced in the United States. It was produced in England and available there at $125. But the tariff on top of the price increased the cost to the prohibitive point for me, and the purchase was not made. The department of physics, New York University, wished to purchase a number of instruments ranging in prices from $600 to $1,000, which were not produced in this country, but because of the added cost of the tariff it was decided that the purchase could not be made, and the students were denied the use of desired equipment. Harvard University needed two instruments for astronomical research, one a photoelectric stellar photometer it had ordered in Germany, the other a thermoelectric microphotometer which it might secure in Holland, to cost about $1,000. But with the additional tariff of 40 percent it was not certain that college finances would permit the purchase. None of these articles were produced in the United States. There are very many other such articles not produced here. It is probable that the free admission of such articles (not produced here) would prove sufficient to cover and permit the annual war debt payments due the United States by other countries.

CONCLUSIONS

What is the lesson to be derived from such lack of methods in our rate making? The lesson, to my mind, can be very briefly presented. There is such a thing as function, there is such a thing as division of labor in this world. The auditor, the cost accountant, the specialist, have all become indispensable in our civilization. In our own private affairs we employ them, and we take no chances whatever. But with regard to this most important subject, the commerce of our country, the crudest methods of 150 years ago are still in vogue. It is a matter of the gravest consequence that in making these tariff rates we do not interfere irrationally with the free movement of commerce. I know there is a type of mind that can notice only the statistics of imports. Imports are easily visible to him while exports possess no visibility. My own view is that Newton's great law of mechanics is as applicable in commerce as it is in the physical world:

Action and reaction are equal and opposite.

The incoming tide must equal the outgoing tide. The incoming tide as imports and the outgoing tide as exports must balance. We can no more cheat the laws of equilibrium in commerce than we can cheat the immortal laws of Sir Isaac Newton himself. But in endeavoring to do so, in a childish way, we do sorely cheat ourselves; we may get a dime so close to the eye as not to see a dollar a yard off, such is the angularity of selfish vision.

In trying to effect these little advantages, what often happens? Knowing not the field before us, we set up influences—industrial and commercial influences—which work their destructive effects not only upon our own industries but upon industries in other parts of the world. A British banker some years ago gave a very striking concrete illustration of the interdependency of world industries. He said that if Russia were suddenly to stop buying tea from India and Ceylon the demand of India for textiles in Great Britain would immediately suffer a decline, and with such decline for textiles there would be a falling off in the demand by the British factories for the cotton crops of our own South; and, of course, as our cotton crops fell in price, a fall in market demand for agricultural machinery would also follow with a whole trail of similar consequences.

Mr. Chairman, my public work has been such that I have had to read a great deal upon this subject. I think the wisest short statement I have ever read was a statement by Henry Sidgwick, an economist and philosopher of the last century, not only one of England's greatest men but perhaps one in a dozen of the greatest men of the nineteenth century.

In summarizing his view of the tariff he said—and I can only quote him roughly—that he did not wholly agree with the classical economists who contended that the tariff never could be made to work a national advantage for the country imposing it; that he himself thought he could conceive instances where a little protection imposed here and there would effect a national advantage in particular cases; but that what he could not conceive was a parliament of men with sufficient wisdom and knowledge of the commerce and industry of the world to pick out only those instances for the application of protection and with enough strength of character to withdraw inexorably the subsidy when the occasion for its application was passed.

Now, just another moment in conclusion. My view that this body is not now and never can be competent to calculate the rates necessary in the rational application of protection must be clear enough. The opinion of Henry Sidgwick, considering the countless number of articles involved, seems to be conclusive. But we cannot now abandon, and we do not wish to abandon, the principle of protection itself, or make violent changes in its application. We do recognize, however, that these rates should be rationalized if they are to serve and not defeat the purpose of the policy itself. In my view, that result can only be accomplished, the rates can only be rationalized, through the executive agencies of the Government; through agencies that can employ the proper staff, that can make the necessary study, and then, acting from a national point of view, not a district or perhaps a single factory view, but from a comprehensive national point of view, determine whether the rate and application serve the purpose of protection.

I welcome the presentation of this bill and the opportunity to vote for it. For the first time in our history we will place this rate making, like railway rate making, in hands, under auspices, where we have a right to hope that intelligent and responsible work will be done. We are saying to the world with regard to restraints upon commerce, "You are on stilts; we are on stilts in our tariffs. You get off your stilts; we will get off our stilts. You give us reasonable, quid pro quo, rates to encourage our manufactures and our industry, and we, on our side, will accord you the same rights and privileges; and so we will all work together to restore that international commerce which through the thousands of years has not only been a blessing to the human family but has been the principal factor in the development of civilization itself." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland submitted the following appendixes:

Dutiable classes, grades, and types of imported articles not produced regularly in commercial quantities in the United States¹

SCHEDULE 1.—CHEMICALS, OILS, AND PAINTS
Article or import class		Par.
Certain acids, n.s.p.f.	1
Carbon dioxide (in containers weighing less than 1 pound)	1
Lactic acid, medicinal	1
Allyl, crotonyl, etc., alcohol	2
Acetone oil	3

Res. 325, 72d Cong., 2d sess. The imports under some of the above indicated classifications, particularly basket clauses, are frequently composed principally of some specific item not produced commercially in the United States, although the generic name of the import classification may be the same as that of articles produced domestically. There may be numerous other articles belonging in this category.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST].

Mr. WEST of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, during recent years the world has been experiencing a period of acute economic distress and suffering. There are today some 30,000,000 wage earners, accustomed to employment, living in forced idleness. The production and trade of the world have fallen to alarming proportions. Measured in value international commerce is today but 35 percent of what it was in 1929.

Many economic and monetary causes have contributed to this result. Primary among these causes is the almost universal existence of high trade barriers built up in a frenzied effort to gain a so-called "favorable balance of trade" by shutting out foreign goods in disregard of the inevitable effect upon those branches of production which depend upon a world market. Most of the nations have erected ever-mounting tariff barriers; they have imposed quantitative import restrictions; they have created State monopolies; they have established governmental control over foreign exchange which serves to limit the supply of funds made available for foreign trade. The difficulties resulting from such a network of barriers can be successfully overcome only by agreements between governments.

The outstanding fact is that the United States, competing with other nations for this diminishing trade, has not been able to hold its own. In 1929 the American share of the import trade of the world was 12.19 percent and of the exports of the world 15.61 percent; in 1932 it had fallen to 9.58 percent of the import trade and 12.39 percent of the export trade. The proportion which it lost, other countries, of course, gained.

The extent to which the trade of the United States has declined in comparison with that of the rest of the world is shown very clearly in the following table:

If the United States is to regain prosperity and not sacrifice large and important agricultural and commercial interests which give employment to many hundreds of thousands of the workers of the country, it must sell certain of its surplus production abroad. This is imperative if the normal American standard of living over large sections of the country is to be maintained. But foreign countries cannot buy American surpluses except with goods or services given in exchange. Furthermore, the maintenance of the American standard of living depends upon our purchase of many foreign commodities. Some of these cannot be produced in the United States. Others can be produced, if at all, only at extraordinary expense or in quantities insufficient for our need.

Furthermore, the problem of maintaining satisfactory prices for many of the staple American products is intimately connected with the decline or revival of foreign commerce. If we are unwilling or unable to work out bargaining interchanges by which such branches of American production as cotton and cereal production, hog raising, fruit growing, and the like can dispose of part of their product in foreign markets, the pressure of supply on the domestic market will necessarily mean continued price depression. The more rigid the trade barriers of the world remain, the more vigorous will have to be the expedients employed to sustain prices.

To meet the present world situation, the first feasible step is to enable the Executive to enter upon a program of bargaining agreements with other nations. The very nature of international negotiation requires that it should be in the hands of the Executive; and to meet an international condition where foreign executives are being clothed with ever greater and greater power to effectuate speedy trade agreements, the United States, if it is to regain its lost proportion of world trade, must delegate similar powers to its President.

The proposed bill nevertheless does not remove from Congress its control of policy which must underlie every tariff adjustment. Although the exigencies of present-day conditions require that more and more of the details be left to Presidential determination, the Congress must and always will declare the policy to which the Executive gives effect.

Throughout this debate there has been considerable discussion with respect to the constitutionality of this proposal. My learned colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beck], to whose discussions of constitutional law I always listen with great admiration, and whose judgment in matters pertaining to constitutional law I respect, has in his very lucid exposition made it appear that this measure is of doubtful or questionable constitutionality.

It is, indeed, true that Congress cannot delegate the legislative function to any other department of the Government. This is widely recognized as a fundamental principle of American constitutional law. This does not mean, however, that the powers which Congress has a right to exercise cannot be embodied in an act authorizing an administrative agency to put into effect in accordance with law upon the determination of certain facts or conditions. In the case of Wayman against Southard (1825) Chief Justice Marshall said:

It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts or to any other tribunal powers which are strictly or exclusively legislative. But Congress may certainly delegate to others powers which the Legislature may rightfully exercise itself.

In American constitutional law it is entirely clear that the establishment of principles or rules of conduct is the essential function of Congress. It is equally clear that this power itself cannot be delegated. But the power to put rules into effect and apply principles, once these are established by Congress, to facts or conditions as they may arise can be vested by Congress in some other governmental agency or department or executive official notwithstanding the constitutional prohibition against the delegation of legislative power.

In the Tariff Act of 1890 there was embodied a delegation of authority which was considered by some as an unwarranted surrender of the constitutional power of Congress. By this act, in order to secure certain reciprocal trade agreements with countries producing certain specified commodities, it was declared that the free importation of such goods therein provided for should be suspended whenever the President was satisfied that the exporting countries were imposing duties upon American products which were reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. When it was determined that these particular circumstances existed it was provided that certain duties specified should be imposed upon the goods that were named in the act. This provision was attacked on the grounds that it was a delegation of legislative authority to the President, but the Supreme Court, in the case of Field against Clark, refused to accept this view. In this opinion the Court declared:

... Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of certain commodities from particular countries, should be suspended, in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspension certain duties should be imposed.

In this notable case the whole subject of legislative delegation of power to an administrative officer was thoroughly examined and significantly upheld. In accordance with the principle established in this opinion, it is constitutional for Congress to enact legislation with a provision either that its operation shall go into effect or be suspended upon the existence of specified conditions which are to be ascertained by an administrative agency. As the Court said in the case of Field against Clark, quoting from a decision of the Ohio Supreme Court in the case of C. W. & Z. Railroad Co. against Commissioners:

The true distinction ... is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made.

Instead of being of questionable constitutionality, the provisions of this act are so plainly in accord with established principles of American constitutional law respecting the delegation of power that there is no doubt about the constitutionality of this act. As a matter of fact, the Supreme Court has never declared a specific delegation of legislative power to an administrative official unconstitutional when the limits and conditions of such delegation of authority were especially designated.

The wise founders of our Government, in the establishment of our Constitution, made provision for the national emergencies that might confront us. The Supreme Court of this country, in its great opinions interpreting its meaning, have clearly established the fact that our Constitution can be adapted to the various crises in our country's history. As the great Chief Justice Marshall said in the notable case of McCulloch against Maryland:

We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding. . . . This is a Constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently to be adapted to crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which the Government should in all future time execute its powers would have been to change entirely the character of the instrument and give it the properties of a legal code. . . . Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and the spirit of the Constitution are constitutional.

It has already been made clear during this debate that the program of reciprocal tariff agreements embodied in the proposed measure is a part of the recovery program. In order to understand fully the importance of this measure it is necessary to remember the emergency which made imperative the adoption of the recovery program.

When the Roosevelt administration was inaugurated a year ago in March an emergency of unparalleled proportions existed. The financial system of the country was on the verge of collapse, industrial activity was paralyzed, and terror had seized the public mind. Widespread popular distress and suffering resulting from unemployment had undermined public confidence in the integrity and stability of our political and economic institutions. For 3 years the depression had proceeded unchecked and capacity for recovery through individual effort had been destroyed. The devastating effects of the depression had brought the country tragically and dangerously close to the point of national disaster.

The dangerous character of this national emergency has never been more vividly described than by Walter Lippmann. In these words he has described the condition that confronted this Nation just a year ago:

At the end of February, as I see it, we had reached a paralyzing deadlock in our affairs. The Federal Government was impotent. The Executive had lost his hold upon Congress, the party leaders had lost their hold upon the Members of Congress, public opinion was distracted and disheartened. There was neither direction nor unity in public life, and the result was a general conviction among the people that they were at the mercy of blind and ruthless economic forces which no one could understand or control. They came to believe that those forces were unmanageable by any conscious policy, and they saw that if this was true they were being pushed irresistibly toward a complete collapse of credit and established values.

This sense of hopeless impotence produced a great panic, in which men, acting on the impulse of each for himself and the devil take the hindmost, tried to save what they could from the wreck. They demanded their money from the banks. They demanded gold for their money. At the climax of the panic in the last week of February the paralysis of government had become so aggravated by a paralysis of the mechanism of exchange that the business of the country was brought virtually to a standstill.

No highly industrialized nation has been subject to greater potential dangers than we were at the end of February. We had an impotent Government in the midst of a universal breakdown of the machinery by which the great urban populations are sustained.

The crisis was one which had to be surmounted without delay. It was not possible to let nature take its course and trust, as in previous great depressions, that the process of adjustment through liquidation of debts and fixed charges and wages would restore a working equilibrium. However theoretically sound such a policy may have been, it was politically, socially, and psychologically impossible. The condition of the farmers and of the unemployed wage earners had become so desperate that a policy of laissez faire could not be contemplated. There is a limit to the endurance of a democratic people. In February we had reached that limit.

It was clear—in fact, it had become increasingly clear as the crisis was developing—that disastrous demoralization could be averted only by a series of rapid, positive measures. These measures would have to be taken by the Federal Government, and, therefore, the first necessity was the reestablishment of its authority. The country had to have a government which had the will and the power to govern. It had to have a government which could formulate measures, could get them adopted, and could apply them without the prolonged debate and the compromises of the ordinary legislative procedure. Men were bound to disagree as to what measures ought to be taken. But it was plain to everyone who had examined the situation that any coherent program resolutely and quickly put into effect was preferable to panic-stricken demoralization arising from the popular conviction that the Federal Government was powerless to have any program whatsoever.

The purpose of the proposed tariff measure accordingly is to extend to the field of our international trade the same effort which has been directed toward the improvement of our national economic conditions in connection with the recovery program.

Whatever may be said in criticism now of the details of the reconstruction legislation or the administration of the recovery measures, this significant fact cannot be denied that the recovery program actually met the emergency toward which it was directed. The immediate task confronting the new administration at the very moment of its inauguration was the restoration of public confidence in the integrity and stability of our institutions and the capacity of the Government to function in a crisis. The outstanding product of the President's courageous action during the national emergency has been the revival of confidence on the part of the people in the integrity of their economic institutions and the ability of their Government to function. Nothing is so highly essential at this time as the maintenance of this renewed confidence and morale unimpaired. It may be true that the public sentiment in support of the recovery program will not in itself bring recovery. But it is also true that without this confidence the reestablishment of normal and wholesome economic conditions will either be indefinitely delayed or made impossible. Renewed confidence, working through the agency of the recovery administration, is the basis for improvement and is the foundation upon which the whole program rests.

During the course of the debate a number of gentlemen of the opposition have endeavored to make it appear that American foreign trade is insignificant and that even if this proposal were adopted that the beneficial results would be negligible. My colleague on the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], sought to establish this view when he declared:

. . . Now, Mr. Chairman, the statistics compiled in the press, in economic studies, including those of the Department of Commerce, the Foreign Policy Association, and numerous other bodies, all show that for a period of 100 years our exports have never averaged more than 7 percent of our total production. There are those who claim that it runs as high as 10 percent, and I am ready to grant even that figure for the sake of argument, but it is an exaggerated figure. But even so, 90 percent of the market for American products lies within the limits of the continental United States. (Extract from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, House, Mar. 23, 1934, p. 5278.)

Our first census of manufactures was in 1899, and any figures previous to that year are in the nature of guesses.

The table as compiled by the Department of Commerce, based on each census of manufactures, is shown below. Note that railroad freight receipts are included as part of the domestic production.

Year	Total domestic production, including freight	Exports of United States merchandise	Percent of total
1899	$9,767,000	$1,253,000	12.8
1904	12,706,000	1,426,000	11.2
1909	17,896,000	1,701,000	9.5
1914	21,407,000	2,071,000	9.7
1919	49,269,000	7,750,000	15.7
1921	35,504,000	4,379,000	12.3
1923	47,244,000	4,091,000	8.7
1925	47,494,000	4,819,000	10.1
1927	47,930,000	4,759,000	9.9
1929	52,795,000	5,157,000	9.8

From 1899 to 1919 the census of manufactures was taken only every 5 years. The figures through 1914 show a consistent trend, and we can only assume that the figures for the intermediate years would be close to those shown. It will be observed that in 1899 nearly 13 percent of domestic production was exported, and that this figure decreased to 11.2 percent in 1904 and to 9½ percent in 1909. It appears, then, that at the beginning of this century the percentage was well above 10 percent, but as the high rates of the Dingley tariff prevented foreign trade from expanding as rapidly as did domestic trade, the percentage fell.

Immediately after the war, as is shown by the figure of nearly 16 percent in 1919 and the figure of over 12 percent in 1921, while the lower Underwood tariff was still in effect, the figures were again much above 10 percent. Immediately after the Tariff Act of 1922, which again checked the growth of imports and exports, the figure dropped below 9 percent; and, while there was some recovery, the figures for 1925, 1927, and 1929 show a slight downward tendency.

It is natural that, in a country so large as the United States and with such varied resources, the percentage of foreign trade to domestic trade should be small. But it is absurd to say that it is limited to 10 percent by any natural law. It has been limited to 10 percent in recent years by the tariff policy which excludes, or nearly excludes, practically every kind of product which can, at however great expense, be produced in the United States. There is every reason to suppose that, under a more liberal policy, the United States could find markets for 15 or 20 percent of its total production—to the great increase of its wealth—since it would export those things which it can produce most effectively and import products now produced at unreasonable cost in this country. Ever since the days of King Midas it has been known to those who reflect upon the matter that a high standard of living does not mean a high consumption of gold per capita but an abundance of commodities of every sort. A more liberal policy of exporting what we produce most effectively, in exchange for products which foreign countries produce much more cheaply than we do, would obviously increase the total supply of goods to be consumed by the American people.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] has also asserted in another part of his remarks that—

• • • There is a very singular fact in connection with this whole question, and it is that almost 90 percent of all of the items imported from these countries are items in competition with agriculture, while the leading exports from the United States to every one of these countries—Canada, Cuba, Mexico, Argentina, Uruguay, Spain, France, Italy, Switzerland, Australia, and New Zealand—was, first, automobiles; second, iron- and steel-mill products; and, third, electrical machinery. (Extract from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, House, Mar. 23, 1934, p. 5279.)

The gentleman listed 11 countries and stated that it is a very singular fact that almost 90 percent of the imports from these countries are items in competition with agriculture. This result is easily obtained by the simple process of picking out countries most of which are primarily agricultural. The list includes, however, France, Italy, and Switzerland, which are predominantly industrial rather than agricultural countries. In 1931 only 14 percent of total French exports, 30 percent of Italy's exports, and only 11 percent of the exports of Switzerland were agricultural. If the gentleman's statement was intended to mean—it is somewhat ambiguous—that 90 percent of American imports from each of these countries are agricultural, it only shows that the American tariff rates on agricultural products have been less prohibitive than the rates on industrial products.

Once again we are presented with another angle of the fallacy of measuring trade and its potentialities on the basis of the limited amount of trade which has survived the drastic obstacles put in its way by the American tariff.

Another gentleman, the distinguished minority leader on the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. TREADWAY], has sought to establish this same point when he declared—

May I say that we consume over 90 percent of our entire products in this country. This Congress, under the leadership of the Democratic Party, seems more interested in the small balance of less than 10 percent than in the 90 percent. There is the real question. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, House, Mar. 23, 1934, p. 5268.)

This statement shows the lack of balance and exaggeration which characterizes attack of the opposition on the tariff bill. This administration and this Congress under Democratic leadership have devoted the whole of their first year to the recovery of the domestic market. The efforts in regard to the domestic market have not stopped. Probably 99 percent of the personnel of the Government is engaged in problems relating to domestic recovery. Certainly much less than 1 percent of the personnel, of the time, and of the attention of the Government has been given to the recovery of our foreign trade. Surely if there is any criticism it should be in the opposite direction, that the Government should sooner have taken steps toward the recovery of some of our previous $5,000,000,000 worth of export trade.

Other examples of the gentleman's exaggerated language are such expressions as "marked for slaughter", "factories closed", "sacrificed on the altar of foreign trade", "the assumption is that * * * the tariff should be reduced or removed altogether"—this under a bill which limits reductions of duties to 50 percent—"destroying the protective tariff system."

In order to make it appear that American export trade is insignificant the gentleman has taken the statistics of our export trade for the year 1933 which show a small volume and compares this trade with the national income for 1929 when this had reached the highest point in our history. In his remarks the gentleman asserted that our rich domestic market, the greatest in the world, would be sacrificed in order to enlarge our relatively small foreign trade.

As a matter of fact great groups of industries in this country depend upon export trade for their normal business activity as the following table indicates:

² Data are for 1929.

This is a bill designed to regain some of the foreign trade lost through the enactment of the infamous Hawley-Smoot-Grundy Tariff Act of 1930. It provides the only modern facilities for preventing foreign governments adopting further restrictive measures against our products, and by equivalent and commensurate concessions for obtaining increased opportunities for the marketing of our products in foreign countries.

As usual in the consideration of any tariff bill, all sorts of fallacious arguments are heard. Much is made of the fact that our exports are only about 10 percent of our production. This figure is made to appear smaller (5 or 6 percent) by including in the comparative figures for the value of our production such expenses as transportation, distribution, and construction. Only such extreme protectionists as that so-called "popular pseudoeconomist", Samuel Crowther, would take seriously such an absurd comparison. Much is also made of the fact that our exports are only an insignificant proportion of our internal trade. Is it any wonder that it is so, considering the efforts of the protectionists to make us completely self-contained by placing every obstacle in the way of foreign trade through such abominations as the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930!

But, mark you, the generalization that exports represent only a small fraction of our domestic trade is, like all generalizations, grossly inaccurate. To many industries and agricultural projects exports are all-important. Let us examine the record: The United States Tariff Commission, in its report to the Senate in response to Senate Resolution 325, Seventy-second Congress, second session, entitled "Economic Analysis of Foreign Trade of the United States in Relation to the Tariff", submitted a list of articles exported from the United States in substantial quantities. In examining this list the obvious conclusion is reached that certain industries are dependent upon foreign markets, if the industries are to prosper and be able to buy large quantities of United States raw materials and to employ large numbers of workers. I shall not call attention to agricultural products, such as cotton, tobacco, lard, and wheat, very considerable proportions of which must be exported if disturbing surpluses are not to accumulate in the United States. The distress brought upon many farmers by the decline of the export markets for these commodities is too well known to need repetition here; and certainly the attempt of the administration to remedy the deplorable situation with respect to these products need not be rehearsed here.

I wish rather to direct attention to other products whose dependence upon export trade is not so obvious as those mentioned. We find, for example, that in the production of canned vegetables, dried fruits, and canned fruits the loss of export trade would cause tremendous losses not only to the processor but to farmers producing the raw materials. Exports of fresh fruits also are large. Exports of fresh apples averaged in 1929 and 1932 approximately 20 percent of the total commercial production; the exports of fresh pears in 1932 represented 10 percent of production. In the case of all dried fruits the exports for 1929 to 1932 represented approximately 45 percent of the total production. The unhappy position of the producers and growers of raisins, dried apricots, and prunes, if their tremendous export markets should be taken away from them, need hardly be mentioned. In prunes, for example, our exports have actually been more than 50 percent of production. We have been exporting about 25 percent of our total production of canned fruits. The west coast growers of fresh fruits and the canners who process these fruits would be faced with ruin if deprived of this important export trade. As a matter of fact, foreign countries, buying normally large quantities of our fresh, dried, and canned fruits, have in some instances adopted sanitary and tariff measures which have greatly impaired our export trade, with the result that distressing conditions have arisen on the Pacific coast, and prices paid to farmers have declined materially because of the heavy carry-overs from season to season.

In the case of lumber we have been exporting between 7 and 9 percent of our production of southern pine; in 1929 and 1931 we exported 17 percent of Douglas fir production and a considerable part of our production of oak; our exports of cedar logs have run between 19 and 26 percent of production. As for other woods and wood manufactures, such as doors, handles for tools, and so forth, exports have represented a considerable portion of the total domestic production.

In the case of paper and manufactures of paper our total exports have run into many millions of dollars, and although in 1932 exports had declined to $18,000,000 and the ratio of exports to production for the entire group was perhaps only 3 or 4 percent, nevertheless the volume has been exceedingly important. For certain items, such as fiber board and insulating material, the export has been 10 to 11 percent of the total production.

Examining nonmetallic minerals, like petroleum and its products, paraffin wax, petroleum asphalt, and so forth, we find that in some of these items exports have been quite large compared with domestic production. In the case of refined petroleum our exports have run between 16 and 20 percent of our production, and the values of such exports have been in the hundreds of millions of dollars. In the case of lubricants, greases, and so forth, exports have run between 34 and 40 percent of our total production. Exports of paraffin wax have been more than 50 percent of the total production; exports of earthenware and plumbing fixtures more than 25 percent of production. Other nonmetallic minerals and products thereof, such as emery wheels, abrasive paper and cloth, carbons and electrodes, show exports amounting from 10 to 20 percent of the total production.

Our manufacturers of iron and steel have always enjoyed an important export market. Certain specialized products, such as tin plate, have been exported in a volume running from 6 to 13 percent of production. Exports of iron and steel manufactures have declined sharply in recent years; for example, structural shapes declined in volume from 7 percent in 1929 to 2 percent in 1932. In terms of money, these finished steel-mill products declined from $96,000,000 in 1929 to $14,000,000 in 1932. It is such declines, in combination with other factors operating in the United States, that have forced so much unemployment in our steel plants and foundries.

Examining our exports of advanced manufactures of iron and steel, we find that exports of safety razors and razor blades declined from 16 percent in 1929 to 6 percent of the domestic production in 1932. Our exports of saws amounted to approximately 10 percent of our production; exports of files and rasps have been over 20 percent of production; exports of chains have been running between 16 and 20 percent of production.

Exports of copper and its products have always been important; exports of certain copper products having amounted to as much as 20 percent of total production.

In the case of electrical machinery and apparatus, our exports of this group in 1929 were valued at $130,000,000; by 1932 they had declined to $43,000,000. Exports of batteries represent 6 or 7 percent of production. Electrical refrigerators represent 6 to 8 percent; radio apparatus, about 11 percent; spark plugs, and so forth, about 8 percent.

Exports of industrial machinery have always been a powerful factor in the success of the domestic enterprise. For all industrial machinery, exports have been running approximately from 12 to 14 percent. Certain branches of the industry are obviously dependent upon exports; for example, exports of mining machinery have been approximately 20 percent of production; exports of power-driven metal-working machinery represented 39 percent of production in 1933; exports of sewing machines have been running over 30 percent of production; exports of shoe machinery, from 10 to 16 percent; printing and bookbinding machinery, 25 to 28 percent; and other industrial machinery, 19 percent. Exports of office appliances have represented approximately 27 to 28 percent of total production; exports of typewriters have run close to 50 percent of production.

Agricultural machinery produced in the United States has been exported in very large volume; in 1931 exports of this entire group represented 30 percent of production. Certain types of agricultural machinery have depended on foreign buyers for practically 50 percent of their business.

The deplorable conditions existing in the automobile business in recent years undoubtedly can be traced in part to the decline in exports; in 1929 exports were valued at $529,000,000, and represented 14 percent of our production. In 1932 they had declined to approximately $75,000,000.

We have been exporting between 20 and 30 percent of our production of aircraft engines and parts; our motorcycle exports have been running over 30 percent of our production.

In examining our chemical schedule any number of items can be found in which the exports represent a considerable portion of our production.

The foregoing is only a sketch in barest outline of the importance of our export situation to particular enterprises in the United States. No mention has been made of the fact that many of the items which are important in relationship of their exports to production have enjoyed a very large percentage of the total world export trade. For some of these the relationship of their present exports to the total world trade in the particular item has not materially changed, but restrictive measures adopted by foreign countries have caused serious declines in the total volume of the goods exported.

Obviously, then, many of our industries and farm operations depend to a large degree on foreign markets for their prosperity. Many are directly interested in exports, and others indirectly in that they furnish those directly concerned with exports their raw materials, supplies, and other requirements. Many industries, farms, and communities are directly interested in exports, and others indirectly affected by decline in export trade. To maintain our present foreign markets, or to extend them, will be impossible except through trade agreements which can be promptly executed. This bill provides the only facilities for doing so.

As a result of the adoption of the recovery program, we have been able to revive confidence in the basic integrity of our institutions and in the capacity of our Government to function in crises. If we are to complete the recovery program, if we are to extend this program of remedial legislation to meet the emergency in our foreign trade, this program must be extended into every part of our industrial activity, including that which involves our international trade.

There are those who seem to forget that there have been at work in our country prior to the crash of the stock market in 1929 basic economic forces that undermined the stability and integrity of our industrial system. In the period from 1913 to 1920 prices in this country rose from the level of 100 to a level of 246, and industrial profits increased accordingly. During the war the Allies bought from this country $11,000,000,000 worth of products. They secured the purchase through loans. They bought $7,000,000,000 more of products through the exchange of securities, and were able by a transfer of more than $1,000,000,000 worth of gold to buy up another $1,000,000,000 worth of our products.

From 1922 to 1929 the physical volume of production in this country increased 42 percent. At the same time the number of wage earners decreased 6 percent, but the industrial output per worker increased 50 percent.

During this period of 5 years prior to 1929 we had permitted the development in this country of a movement that was undermining the purchasing power of the American people. The volume of wages increased only 13 percent, while industrial profits increased 72 percent and profits in the form of corporate dividends increased 265 percent. At the height of industrial activity in 1928, when the increase over 1927 was $7,000,000,000 in industrial income, we had a decrease in the volume of wages of $600,000,000. At a time when we were increasing production of commodities over ordinary consumption in this country one would expect there would be an increased demand for labor. The fact is there was actually a decrease.

While we have had an increase in the volume of production, we had a decline in labor to such an extent that over this period of 5 years the volume of wages declined. This increase in profits went into industrial expansion, and we were producing a volume of goods that the purchasing power of the people of this country could not absorb. How did we finance the purchase of these goods? By instalment buying, by inflation of credit, and by permitting practices that made possible the consumption of this volume of production beyond the current purchasing power.

During this period of time we were sending the exportable surplus of our goods to foreign countries. We were financing this surplus by the extension of loans to foreign countries and foreign enterprises over this period of time to the extent of nine or ten billion dollars. We invested $14,000,000,000 in private investments in foreign countries.

The basic principle of this whole economic situation that is ignored by the gentlemen of the opposition in their attack upon this measure is that we have a domestic purchasing power that rests upon the economic activities of our people, and the volume of wages must correspond to the volume of production, or else there is going to be such a tragic dislocation of the economic forces so that we will continue to have permanently an economic depression like that which this country has experienced during the last 3 or 4 years. At the same time we must have an outlet for this exportable surplus, which represents the employment of something like two or three million American workers directly and seven or eight million indirectly, or we shall never be able permanently to restore a normal and wholesome basis for economic activities in this country.

There is a fundamental fallacy in the argument of the opposition that favors the development of a degree of isolation that would cause us absolutely to restrict our trade activities to the domestic market. If we were a debtor nation, and if we had service and interest obligations to transmit to foreign countries, then their policy within reasonable limits might safeguard the transfer problem and permit the servicing of our debts to foreign countries; but in the last 10 years we have reversed our position from that of a debtor nation to that of a creditor nation. Whether we like it or not, we are obliged to receive every year in interest payments and in our service obligations on debts owed to the United States an amount of money which taken by itself with the diminished local production is so great a percentage of that production that we cannot absorb the interest charges paid to us.

If the gentlemen are going to talk about the destruction of inefficient industries and are going to say that this tariff proposal means that we are going to pick out selected industries that are inefficient and destroy them, putting into the hands of the President of the United States the power of life or death over American industries, they have also to face the proposal that if they go ahead with their program of self-containment they will have to acknowledge the impossibility of the payment of any obligation owed by a foreign nation to the American people, and logically the only next step they can take is the cancellation of the war debts and the cancellation of all these interest obligations due to American firms and business enterprises. This means the destruction of the system of international financing, the collapse of which, amounting to billions of dollars, would be so serious that our financial structure could not withstand the strain. It is only by increasing the volume of international trade to such an amount that the service obligations paid by foreign governments on account of war debts and by foreign business enterprises on account of our investments, that we are able to keep the percentage of this payment as related to the total volume of international trade so small that we are able to absorb the amounts that are paid to us on these international obligations.

Remember that nations pay for their trade in only one of four ways: Either by gold, by services, by securities, or by goods. The gold has already been transferred to this country. France and the United States have the great bulk of the gold. Securities were transferred to this country during the war. Services furnished Americans are inadequate. The only means of meeting trade balances is on the basis of an exchange of commodities, and if we are unwilling to recognize this fact we are running counter to the basic principles of international trade, for, after all, international trade, in its last analysis, is actual trade, and if we are going to restrict the volume of international trade to such a small total value or total volume that we stifle this international activity the financial structure in every commercial country in this world will be subjected to such a severe strain that it will not be able to withstand the shock of a self-containment policy adopted by every major commercial nation in the world today.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I believe it was brought out in the committee hearings that 67 percent of all articles listed in the present tariff law are on the free list; in other words, only 33 percent pay a duty. Will the gentleman give the House some idea as to the things he would buy abroad in order to stimulate commerce; that is, things that are not now on the free list?

Mr. WEST of Ohio. I will be very glad to refer the gentleman to the three tables that are published in the report of the Tariff Commission and to which reference has already been made in the debates, of those articles that come into this country that lend themselves to reciprocal tariff agreements.

You will find in list 2, in list 3, and in list 9 of these reports of the Tariff Commission the very articles to which the gentleman refers at the present time.

LIST OF IMPORTS UPON WHICH DUTIES CAN BE REDUCED

List 2: Dutiable articles of which the imports are less than 5 percent of domestic production.

List 3: Articles on which the tariff rates exceed 50 percent ad valorem.

List 9: Dutiable articles more or less noncompetitive and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages.

Based upon a study of the United States Tariff Commission entitled "Economic Analysis of Foreign Trade of the United States in Relation to the Tariff", in response to Senate Resolution No. 325, Seventy-second Congress, second session.

The fact of the matter is that retaliatory tariffs adopted by foreign nations against American products have so fettered international trade that unless some method of this character of dealing specifically with individual nations with respect to particular commodities, commodities that we must have for the maintenance of our domestic economy, and thereby incur the advantages of the most-favored-nation clauses of the treaties that other nations have with third nations, there is absolutely no way of meeting the problem of this system of trade quotas and devices of one kind and another that have brought international trade down to the alarmingly low levels that exist today.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman is making a very interesting statement and I dislike very much to interrupt, but the gentleman is referring to the present low levels of our foreign trade. This is not due to the tariff, surely, because we are on the lowest tariff level of any country in the world at the present time, and when the President revalued gold and reduced the gold content of the dollar, in effect he reduced the specific tariff rates on commodities by 40 percent. I think this was testified to before the committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. WEST of Ohio. The argument has been made again and again that because of our revaluation policy we have so altered the value of the dollar and depreciated it abroad that we have lowered the tariff, and statements have been made again and again by gentlemen of the opposition, just as my colleague has made the statement, that we have in effect altered by the revaluation program the value of the dollar to such an extent that we have lowered the tariff rates. As a matter of fact the reverse is true.

Let me take a practical example. When England was on gold and we were on gold, the British pound was worth $4.84, and if an Englishman wanted to buy an American typewriter, he took £10 to the bank in order to get $50 to buy an American typewriter. Then England went off gold and the British pound went down from $4.84 to $4, and down to $3.50, and finally to $3.11, and instead of bringing £10 to the bank and get $50 he had to bring £16 to the bank to get the same amount of money. This prohibited the importation into England from our country of our products, and this extended to all other items.

Then we went off gold, 2 years too late, as was testified before our committee by gentlemen who represented your point of view. They made admissions that we went off too late, but when we did go off gold, the American dollar depreciated and the British pound, in terms of American dollars, went up from $3.11 to $3.50, to $4, and ultimately, I believe, to $5.50. So that once again the British citizens abroad wanting to buy an American product, instead of bringing £16 to the bank to get $50, brought once again £10 and then £9; and as we further depreciated the dollar by altering the gold content of that dollar, we depreciated it on the foreign-exchange market and made possible the depreciation to the extent that foreigners can buy goods in this country to export abroad, and we encouraged our export trade.

The contention that this revaluation program was a lowering of tariff rates is unsound, because when you reverse the position and have an American buying goods abroad with cheap American dollars which have purchased dear foreign currencies, you have increased your tariff by the same percentage that you have devaluated the dollar. The contentions of the gentlemen of the opposition to the contrary notwithstanding are based upon a fallacy and a misunderstanding of the actual policy that was involved.

Every nation in this world, Mr. Chairman, except Holland and Switzerland and the United States, revealed their gold at percentages ranging from 65 or 70 percent to 150 percent, in the case of Japan, and 300 percent in the case of Italy and France; and we were only following, belatedly, a policy with reference to our monetary program that was in accord with the realities of international trade and for the purpose of reinforcing our export trade. That monetary policy, which was an integral part of the recovery program, did stimulate our export trade.

Now, this present tariff measure is for the purpose of supplementing and completing and reinforcing that monetary policy so that we will have reciprocal opportunities to deal with foreign nations on a basis of equality, with the same instruments and tools and devices that they use, in order that we can restore to American workers, two or three millions of them, the livelihood that they gain from pursuits that engage in international trade.

The opposition should not become alarmed at the mere suggestion of the reduction in the rates of duty. The enactment of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 has automatically led to an increase from 50 to 70 percent in the cost of imports from gold-standard countries; an increase which has been somewhat less from countries having a depreciated currency. Even if a uniform reduction of 50 percent were made in all rates, and no such thing is contemplated by the pending bill, the rates on imports from gold-standard countries would still remain above the height of the Hawley-Smoot Act, which I am sure our protectionist friends on the other side consider high enough.

The Honorable Daniel C. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, in his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on the pending bill, made the following statement regarding the increased protection resulting to domestic producers by reason of the devaluation of the American dollar. I quote from pages 65 and 66 of the Ways and Means Committee hearings:

* * * With the recent devaluation of the American dollar to 59 cents, it now takes nearly 69 percent more dollars to pay for any particular foreign import shipment than it did a year ago, assuming the foreign price has not changed. There has thus been brought into operation an additional all-around tariff protection or handicap on imports, which has been in only small measure offset by increased costs of production or prices of domestic products resulting from the N.R.A. or other recovery measures. In other words, prices in this country could increase to approximately 70 percent over a year ago before domestic producers would be under any increased pressure from foreign imports, except insofar as the exchange value of particular foreign currencies have also depreciated—and very few have depreciated as much as the American dollar. * * *

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. How does the gentleman reconcile his statement that the devaluation of money does not affect the tariff? I have in mind that when Japan devalued the yen from 50 to 20 cents it enabled them to flood our market with toys, rubber and electrical goods, and so forth, and it was necessary for the Government to put an embargo on several products coming from that country. I should like to have the gentleman reconcile the practical proposition and the theoretical.

Mr. WEST of Ohio. The gentleman's argument rests on a fallacy with reference to this factor, and that is the standard of living as involved in international trade. The standard of living in any country, which is a basic factor in international trade, does not rest on the labor cost alone, but on the per capita production, and its relation to the per capita production of other countries.

The minute you restrict the per capita production in this country, you lower the standard of living, and the only way to restore it is to increase the per capita production in the various industries, and that will be done by this bill. [Applause.]

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST of Ohio. I yield to the lady from California.

Mrs. KAHN. Reverting to the point where I asked the gentleman to yield, I should like to know the name of the gentleman he referred to as publisher.

Mr. WEST of Ohio. Walter Lippman.

Mrs. KAHN. Has the gentleman read the article in this morning's paper by Walter Lippman that the N.R.A. is an economic bedlam and has retarded rather than helped recovery?

Mr. WEST of Ohio. I have read some articles by Mr. Lippman that were critical. I said he was critical. But I have heard him on other occasions speak in praise of the economic soundness of the program and insist that it was essentially sound and economic from the viewpoint of meeting the emergency.

Mrs. KAHN. When was the article published the gentleman referred to?

Mr. WEST of Ohio. A month ago.

Mrs. KAHN. Evidently the gentleman has changed his mind since then.

Mr. WEST of Ohio. He said it was sound economically and met the emergency, and he is a gentleman that does not change his views over night.

Under recent tariff acts rates have become so high that international trade in any large volume has been impossible. Retaliatory rates against American goods have resulted in an alarming decrease in our export trade. The following tables indicate the rates in the various acts:

Only the adoption of the proposed measure will make possible the encouragement of a normal and wholesome condition in international economic relationships.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have always been a staunch disciple of the doctrine of a high protective tariff as enunciated and expounded by that great Republican and illustrious American, William McKinley. I have subscribed to that doctrine because I have believed that only by such a tariff can American labor and American industry be safeguarded and protected against the pauper labor of foreign competitive nations. Corollarily, I have always favored a rigid immigration policy on the theory that every alien admitted to the United States reduces in proportion to the number admitted the opportunities of the American laboring man. But, Mr. Chairman, if we are to admit to the markets of America the products of the sweatshops of foreign nations, our restricted immigration policy automatically becomes an idle gesture.

During this debate we have heard a great deal about inefficient industry. If I understand Secretary Wallace correctly his definition of inefficient industry is that any industry that cannot operate and produce as cheaply as its competitor is inefficient. I understand that he has condemned and proposes to ban the further expansion of the sugar industry in this country because we cannot produce sugar as cheaply as Cuba or the Philippines. It seems to me that in the production of a commodity the cost of production is the chief element to be considered. I presume that we might produce sugar as cheaply in the United States as it can be produced in any other country, provided our sugar industries paid the same scale of wages to its employees as are paid to those performing similar work in other countries. But, Mr. Chairman, the American laboring man in all lines of industry demands a living wage. And when I speak of a living wage I do not mean a wage that will merely enable him and his family to eke out a miserable existence—to live from hand to mouth—but a wage that will permit him to enjoy the comforts and some of the luxuries of life. That is the American wage, and every red-blooded American wants to see this sort of wage condition maintained. And it is to preserve that sort of a living wage that necessitates the maintenance of a protective tariff of the William McKinley variety.

Apropos of what I have just said, I ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks a brief excerpt from a short article by Robert Quillen appearing in the March 22 issue of the Washington Post, which is as follows:

In various reliable publications you find a printed list of articles that Japan is selling below the American cost of manufacture.

One of the articles is a gold-tipped fountain pen that sells for 7½ cents.

That is not the retail price. The retailer may get 49 cents or as much as 69. But the price that matters in world trade is the wholesale price fixed by the Japanese manufacturer.

Because it is so ridiculously and unbelievably low, the Japanese are rapidly monopolizing the export business of the world.

How do they do it?

Well, standing at a workbench in a Japanese factory is a little toylke boy. The factory record says he is 10 years old, 10 years being the legal minimum for wage earners in Japan, but he may be younger.

His pay is 4 cents a day.

Tens of thousands of children like him are making Japan's cheap products. And skilled adults who do the more difficult work are paid as little as 30 and 40 cents a day.

Knowing this to be true, and knowing that Japanese manufacturers unscrupulously imitate wrappers and packages and steal the trade mark of honest men in other lands, statesmen shudder in dread of such competition and picture the ultimate closing of American factories.

But the story has another side.

The fountain pen soon comes apart. The barrel is bamboo. It is an artful imitation of a fountain pen—nothing more.

And the other cheap products that Japan is now dumping in the markets of the world are of similar quality. They look good, but they are shoddy.

What Mr. Quillen says about Japan can be said with equal truth and propriety about goods manufactured in various other foreign countries and then dumped into the United States to be sold in competition with goods manufactured in American industry by American labor which demands a living wage for its toil.

Mr. Chairman, of course, the objective of this legislation is to reduce and lower our tariff wall. Otherwise, there would be no excuse or justification for it. I may be charged with being an isolationist. I am at least a nationalist, because I contend that charity should really begin at home. I am violently opposed to a reduction in any tariff schedule that will permit the merchandise from foreign countries to come into the United States and be sold cheaper than they can be efficiently manufactured by our own industry. The same principle applies with equal or greater force to the products of the soil. With agriculture prostrate, the livestock industry paralyzed, and with hundreds of millions of the taxpayers' money being expended in an effort, which appears to many to be in vain, to resuscitate these important basic industries, it is now proposed to vest in one man the power to revise our tariff laws which may place these industries in still greater jeopardy.

Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the pathetic plight of the livestock growers of the United States, within the past few months we have seen tons after tons of canned-meat products shipped into the United States in competition with an already utterly demoralized domestic market. Old impoverished cows and infecundous bulls slaughtered and canned in the Argentine have been imported into this country and dumped upon our already glutted market. And, my friends, the melancholy and disgraceful feature of the affair is that our own Government purchased a large part of this inferior product and fed it to the boys in the C.C.C. camps throughout the country. When this disgraceful fact was revealed to the public, a great howl of indignation went up, followed by administrative apology and promise not to do so again. Is it any wonder that choice steers in this country were being sacrificed at 2½ and 3 cents a pound, and cows as low as 60 cents a hundred?

How do you expect the lumber industry of America to compete with timber products produced by slave and penal labor in Russia? Vast timber forests in Russia, most of which are inside the Arctic Circle, are being processed now and precipitated into the markets of the world. A witness testified before the Immigration Committee of the House a few days ago that the Soviet Government has numerous large prison camps in these vast forests, and that each prisoner is required to cut down and trim 18 trees per day, and that they are not allowed to return to camp until this task has been performed. This barbarous system is applied to women prisoners as well as men because under the Stalin government there is no distinction or discrimination on account of sex. This witness stated that thousands of such prisoners die yearly in those concentration camps from sheer exposure and exhaustion. I know it will be said that under our tariff laws goods manufactured by enforced labor cannot be admitted. But, my friends, there is bootlegging in all lines of industry, and there is no way to prevent it except by giving American industry adequate tariff protection.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss the constitutionality, or rather the lack of constitutional grace of this measure. We all know that under the philosophy of the new deal the Constitution is in a state of inertia and abeyance at this time. That grand old document which in the past has been regarded as the Ark of the Covenant and the bulwark of the Republic, has been indefinitely furloughed. To paraphrase what Mark Antony said over the body of the great Caesar:

Only but yesterday the Constitution might have stood against the world, but now lies it there and none are so poor as to do it reverence.

While discussing the Bankhead cotton bill in another body a few days ago the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], attacking the constitutionality of the measure, said:

If the Supreme Court passes that, I should know the end of all things had come in America, and I shall prepare for the socialistic regime and dictatorship.

I thoroughly concur in the sentiment thus expressed by the able and courageous Senator from North Carolina. And yet, my friends, this measure we are considering today is just another unit in the legislative procession that is rapidly rushing this Nation into downright absolutism. Congress has abdicated one constitutional prerogative after another until it stands today almost denuded of power.

If it continues to surrender its constitutional authority, this body will soon cease to function altogether. If this is to be our program, we might as well disband and go home and stop the useless expense incident to congressional sessions.

But, my friends, I am persuaded to believe that the heyday and honeymoon of the "brain trust" is on the wane. We are beginning to see unmistakable evidences of its disintegration. I believe the American people are beginning to get wise to this nefarious racket. I think it ought to be apparent to every student of recent events that the "brain trust" is much more interested in changing our form of government than it is in recovery. In fact, recovery is of secondary or less importance in their scheme. Regimentation and ultimate dictatorship is their paramount ambition.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are patient and long-suffering, but when they are aroused their indignation and vengeance know no bounds. Under the subtle influence of a subsidized press, a subservient radio, and all other avenues of intimidated and coerced publicity the people have been lulled into a stupor; but the spell is already showing signs of breaking, and when the people get their eyes open to this deadly menace this little "brain trust" will crumble beneath their wrath even as straw in the path of a tornado. When this awakening comes the Constitution will have a new baptism and the people will have a new appreciation of the virtues of liberty. They will have a new realization and conception of the meaning of Lexington, Valley Forge, and Yorktown.

Mr. Chairman, sometimes I am amused at the remarkable metamorphosis of the Democratic Party. The members of this great party used to be almost fanatical in their championship of State rights. Three score and ten years ago a bloody fratricidal war was fought on that issue. A short time ago the Democratic Party was violently opposed to subsidy and centralized government. Now they want to subsidize States, counties, municipalities, industries, and individuals. They have set up a colossal bureaucracy in Washington, the magnitude and complexity of which almost staggers the imagination—a bureaucracy whose tentacles penetrate every nook and corner of the Nation.

What has become of the old Jeffersonian Democracy? Alas! it has gone the way of the dodo, the mastodon, and the ichthyosaurus. States rights is now only a memory, and subsidy and centralized government are sweet morsels which our Democratic brethren roll on their tongues with increasing glee and gratification.

My friends, the gymnastics of our Democratic brethren on this character of legislation are indeed most ludicrous. When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, which invested a very limited and conditional flexible power over tariff rates in the Executive, the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, chairman of the committee that brought in the legislation we are now considering, had this to say:

This is too dangerous and alarming to contemplate. With all this power vested in the President of the United States he becomes a colossus. It is too much power and authority to lodge in any man who ever has been, is now, or ever will be President of the United States. In fact, with all this unrestricted and unlimited power he would be in a better position to overthrow our form of government and proclaim himself king than was the first consul of France, the great Napoleon, when he overthrew the French Government and proclaimed himself Emperor.

And yet only 5 years after these ominous words were uttered the same man on the same subject, except much more augmented and aggravated, in discussing this bill a few days ago had this to say:

The bill, in my judgment, is one of the most important parts of the President's recovery program, and will materially assist in restoring prosperity and setting the wheels of industry turning again.

Mr. Chairman, Consistency is indeed a precious jewel. But the constancy of the Democratic Party on public issues can only be compared to the fixedness of the North Star, about which the bards of old sang so eloquently. Seriously, Mr. Chairman, the inconsistency of the Democratic Party is indeed a challenge to one's credulity. The things they once loved they now hate, and vice versa.

Mr. Chairman, I assume, of course, that this measure, under the lash of the White House, will pass the House, but it is to be hoped by the friends of constitutional government that when it reaches another body it will be defeated or materially modified; but if not that, when it is presented to that great tribunal, the Supreme Court, it will receive the condemnation at the hands of that body which it deserves. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, while I agree with the criticism of this bill on constitutional grounds, I propose in the few minutes that I have to devote my attention particularly to the specific results which will occur, and just where they will occur, if this bill should be enacted into law. In all the years that I have been in Congress, I think there has been no bill which has excited such uniform objection from my own district, from the State of Connecticut, and from New England. I have telegrams and letters, the committee has had telegrams and letters, from practically every town setting forth fears that the industry which is represented will be liable to destruction if this bill should pass.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. If these manufacturers, who, after all, are more concretely interested than anyone else, or should be, thought for a moment that this legislation would promote foreign commerce, they would be down here in hordes asking for its enactment, would they not?

Mr. MERRITT. That is correct. We hear from many members of the administration the doctrine that so-called "inefficient" industries should be stopped. Some of them say that the death should be immediate, while others say that it might be accomplished slowly and more mercifully. It is a fact that all over New England there are many industries, some of them large, many of them small, which have, under tariff protection given them, been sufficiently efficient to exist for generations, some of them for more than a hundred years, and during that time they have kept alive against all foreign competition, even exporting many of their goods, and have extended their trade all over the United States. Many of those industries are not only self-supporting, but they actually support the town in which they exist. A whole town has grown up around some special industry.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman knows that my interests in Connecticut are like his own and in New England. I am considerably troubled by the statements that have been repeatedly made about killing off so-called "inefficient" industries. Does the gentleman know of any industry in our State or in New England that would be subject to decapitation as a result of this measure?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. It was testified to before our committee that there are a number of small, inefficient industries in New England that should go by the board. If the gentleman will read the hearings, he will find that out.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. And the name of any such industry?

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not think any was specifically named; but these representatives of the administration said there are a number of small, inefficient industries that could not exist except for the protective tariff.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut the question then. Is not that very largely based on fear rather than fact?

Mr. MERRITT. Of course; this whole bill produces fear, and that is what I speak about. I do not think it would be wise to give the names of these concerns, because it might create a notion that the industries are at present in trouble, which is not the fact. Many have told me, and have said in telegrams and letters, that different articles they produce can be put down in New York, from Japan, for instance, at a less price than the articles cost them in the shop.

I think everyone agrees, from the President down, that what we want in this country as a basis for the increase of business and sound prosperity is confidence. When this bill is enacted, if it is enacted, what bank in Connecticut is going to lend money, and what industry will desire to borrow money, if they do not know from month to month whether their tariff protection is going to be taken away from them, so that they will not be able to do business at all?

I think that the very statement of the prospect of this bill's passing has slowed down business, and I think that the enactment of it would so increase that feeling of insecurity as largely to stop business.

Going back to the point argued by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST], I think there can be no doubt that the devaluation of the dollar has made it easier to import goods, because if the import duty on any article is, say, $100, it is now much easier to pay that $100 in foreign exchange, because the value of the dollar has declined. Some importers have told me that the result of this devaluation on the average was to decrease the actual duty by about 25 percent, and, therefore, the protection to that amount. On the other hand, the effect of the N.R.A. is unquestionably to increase cost. The whole cry of the administration is to take on men and increase wages. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that the combined effect of the N.R.A. and the devaluation of the dollar is to reduce the protective effect of duties by nearly 50 percent. If, on top of that, all industries are threatened and no one knows where the blow is going to fall, the effect will be very destructive. If they would name the particular industries in mind, the others might feel free.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, we repeatedly tried to have the representatives of the administration name the industries or articles they propose to aim at, and they refused to do so.

Mr. MERRITT. I want the Members of this House on both sides to feel, as I do, that if this bill is enacted it is possible for any irresponsible member of the administration or any of its advisers to take a course which will not only stop some industries in some towns in New England but possibly will destroy that town and depopulate it and force its people to seek other places to live, which will be very difficult.

I cannot conceive how any man from any part of the country can wish to take upon his conscience that responsibility. Certainly, for my part, I do not. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to file from Foley's History something that has been said by Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson and Simon Cameron on the tariff question.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract of message from Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, to Congress, Dec. 7, 1830]

Among the numerous causes of congratulation the condition of our impost revenue deserves special mention, inasmuch as it promises the means of extinguishing the public debt sooner than was anticipated, and furnishes a strong illustration of the practical effects of the present tariff upon our commercial interests.

The object of the tariff is objected to by some as unconstitutional; and it is considered by almost all as defective in many of its parts.

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties, with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely incidental to that power that it is difficult to support the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them, and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case. This indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress. In this conclusion I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

That our deliberations on this interesting subject should be uninfluenced by those partisan conflicts that are incident to free institutions is the fervent wish of my heart. To make this great question, which unhappily so much divides and excites the public mind, subservient to the short-sighted views of faction, must destroy all hope of settling satisfactorily to the great body of the people, and for the general interest. I cannot, therefore, in taking leave of the subject, too earnestly, for my own feelings or the common good, warn you against the blighting consequence of such a course.

[Simon Cameron's reference to George M. Dallas, Vice President, Congressional Globe, 29th Cong., 1st sess.]

We are told out of the House that this bill is to become a law by the casting of the Vice President. I am happy to say that I have seen no evidence of such intention; nor will I believe there is such a design until I am convinced by the evidence of my own senses. To all the inquiries that have been made of me, I have said that it cannot be—that no native Pennsylvanian, honored with the trust and confidence of his fellow citizens, could prove recreant to that trust and dishonor the State that gave him birth. His honorable name, the connection of his ancestry with her history, forbid it; his own public acts and written sentiments forbid it. If, as has been said, this question is to be settled by the casting vote of the Vice President, he will not, as a wise man, adopt a bill which no Senator will father, but will rather, taking advantage of his high and honorable position, make one which will contribute to the happiness of our people and the glory of our common country. Let him not be allured by the voice of the flattery from the sunny South. No man can be strong abroad who is not strong at home. Before a public man risks a desperate leap he should remember that political gratitude is prospective; that desertion of home, of friends, and of country may be hailed by the winning party when the traitor is carrying in the flag of his country; but when the honors of the Nation whom he has served are to be distributed, none are given to him.

Will any man believe that a son of South Carolina, occupying the chair, elected under such circumstances, with the casting vote in his hands on this bill, would give that vote contrary to the almost unanimous wishes of his own State? And shall it be said that a Pennsylvanian has less attachment for his Commonwealth than a son of Carolina? I have said that I will not believe it; and, as evidence that it cannot be so, I give, in conclusion, the following eloquent passage from a speech of the Honorable George M. Dallas, when occupying the seat I now hold, on a question precisely similar to the one now before us.

[Cyclopedia of Jefferson Foley. Extracts from Messages and Letters of Thomas Jefferson]

"Congress is the great commanding theater of this Nation, and the threshold to whatever department of office man is qualified to enter." (To William Wert, v. 223 (W. 1808).)

"The representatives of the people in Congress alone are competent to judge the general disposition of the people, and to what precise point of reformation they are ready to go." (To Mr. Rutherford, iii, 409 (p. 1792).)

"Preserve inviolate the fundamental principle that the people are not to be taxed but by representatives chosen immediately by themselves. (To James Madison, ii, 328; Ford ed., iv, 475 (p. 1787).)

"The authority of Congress can never be wounded without injury to the present Union." (To the President of Congress. Ford ed., ii, 286 (W.G. 1790).)

"The sense of Congress is always respectable authority." (Official Opinion, vii, 499; Ford ed., 209 (1790).)

"As I never had the desire to influence Members, so neither had I any other means than my friendships, which I valued too highly to risk by usurpation on their freedom of judgment, and the conscientious pursuit of their own sense of duty." (To President Washington, iii, 410; Ford ed., v, 1102 (1792).)

"The executive in our governments is not the sole, it is scarcely the principal object of my jealousy. The tyranny of the legislatures is the most formidable dread at present, and will be for many years. That of the executive will come in its turn, but it will be at a remote period." (To James Madison, iii, 5; Ford ed., v, 83 (1780).)

Mr. FOCHT. We have had most illuminating and instructive debate on a question that will never be settled here at all, and that is the tariff. That is not the question at issue. It is a fact, however, that this country started as an infant. It became the greatest nation in the world because of the protective tariff. We have infant industries which started in a small way, which became great competitors of the mightiest manufacturing institutions of England. Now it is proposed to do something unheard of in all history or all business. That is, to destroy American industries that have not yet grown to full manhood or rounded out into complete economic development. To me that is the grossest, rankest absurdity that I have ever heard coming from anyone, although most anything might come from the man who will be charged with the responsibility of administering this so-called "tariff law", the Secretary of Agriculture, since it has taken him more than a year to even gesture a proposition that will relieve the farmer in regard to the dairy question.

There was a great philosopher who sat here as Speaker of this House at one time, Thomas Reed. As to the tariff question, Thomas Reed said:

I care not as to your argument or the pedantic maxims of the bookmen, nor how a thing may sound or how a thing may look. What I want to know is, How does it work?

Anyone who knows anything about the history of his country knows that every time you ever tinkered with the tariff you brought wreck and ruin to American industry.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. For a short question.

Mr. HOEPEL. Did the Tariff Act of 1930 bring ruin to this country?

Mr. FOCHT. The Tariff Act of 1914, before it was even in full operation, brought soup houses and calls for raiment; but I do not care to get into an argument with the gentleman from California. We agree on too many things.

I want to call attention to one of the most tragic incidents that ever occurred in American political life. It has a direct relation to this question of extending supreme power and confidence to any one man. I am not going into a long story of what I think of the President, because we all respect the President and believe in his patriotism; but as to his ultimate wisdom on a question of this kind, I asked the other day, "What are his tendencies?" Do I, as a protectionist, believing as I do and as you do, all of you, and as I will show your leaders believe, in a protective tariff, confide this to one man? If a commission cannot do it, how is one man going to revise the great tariff schedules which have developed three times over what they were in the last tariff bill?

How can President Roosevelt do justice to a revision of tariffs in this country if you cannot do it by a committee which has had long experience which he has not had? I have faith in him as far as he can go, but even he has his limitations. He never served in the Congress. I regret exceedingly that he has not spent at least 6 years here. He would not have been caught in the position he was last night if he had spent some time here. He could not comprehend what the people wanted yesterday or he would not have vetoed that bill. If he had spent some time here he would have better understood the sentiment of the country yesterday, and if he could not understand that how could he know about a thousand complex tariff schedules? There is no great mysticism about it, no black art, no legerdemain, but there is so much to consider about it, on account of the vast variety of industries and interests in this country, that I doubt whether he or any other single individual has the capacity to do that job.

But even if he had the capacity, what would he do? What are his tendencies in regard to a protective tariff?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. There was elected from Pennsylvania in 1844 a Vice President of the United States. A delegation of leading business men of Pennsylvania went to Philadelphia, and in the great parlor of the home of George M. Dallas they saw him raise his hand and swear before God that if elected Vice President and there came to him the question of deciding any tie vote on any tariff bill he would support the tariff of 1842.

On this sacred promise the Polk-Dallas ticket swept Pennsylvania. What happened? I say there was a near tragedy in the politics of the United States when this great man, with wonderful antecedents, great family tradition, a great man himself, when the hour struck for a test of his integrity and his loyalty, he voted in the United States Senate for the repeal of this tariff law of 1842, with resultant desolation and ruin throughout the country.

I say, my friends, a man is just as strong as he is. He is impelled by what has actuated his conduct in the past, and, therefore, unless I knew definitely what his tendencies are, what Mr. Roosevelt thinks about the tariff, what his environment and contact has been about it, the simple promise that he will make trades, to me, means nothing in the presence of the story of George Dallas.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield briefly.

Mr. KENNEY. Does not the gentleman believe the present tariff ought to be revised?

Mr. FOCHT. I am amazed at the causes which have been assigned for our present difficulty. Let us not forget that half the wealth of the world cannot be destroyed in war, without making its effect felt, and still have it. We are having our difficulties; and if ever there was a time to correct them, now is that time. The great majority held by the party on the other side of the aisle should earlier in this session have been used to pass laws for the protection of the arm of labor, of the farm, and all industry. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein the excerpts I previously referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE].

PROGRESSIVE ABDICATION OF POWERS—TARIFF

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Chairman, passage of this tariff bill will constitute another successive step in the abdication by Congress of its constitutional powers and a delegation of them to the President. We are asked to give him unrestricted power over the life or death of any unit or section of American industry and agriculture. All industry and agriculture will be placed under the direct control of the President. We are asked to delegate to the President the sole and exclusive power to make tariff treaties or Executive agreements which is equivalent to granting the power to tax. Such a delegation of power is not authorized by the Constitution and is repugnant to and directly in conflict with section 8 of article I, which states that:

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

I quote from the Washington Star of March 3, 1934:

With considerable boldness he (the President) has proposed that the President be clothed with complete authority to make reciprocal trade agreements between the United States and other nations, and to lower tariff duties by 50 percent to bring about such agreements, or to raise them by 50 percent if need be. In other words, he proposes to take over the tariff-making business from Congress. * * * Certainly it leaves with the President the power to amend the tariff duties by Executive order in such a way as to crush absolutely American industries. Now, no matter whether there are industries supported by the present tariff wall which are not wise economically, the owners and workers in these industries will not relish being wiped out.

Quoting from the Washington Post of March 26, 1934:

For over a year * * * he has been developing policies, first under the plea of national emergency, more lately with the vague objective of a planned economy, which have become increasingly at variance with campaign assurances. * * * Instead of lending his magnetic personality to the re-creation of a nation of freemen, the President has let the country be steered closer and closer to a system of rigid State regimentation, which is reminiscent of the feudal system. The criterion of that economy system was complete subordination of the individual to codes and standards prescribed from above.

From the inception of the Seventy-third Congress abdication of legislative powers has been a procession. A review of legislation passed reveals that in the Emergency Banking Act the President sought and received ratification and extension of authority over banking and finance; that under this act the President has power to regulate credit, currency, gold, silver, and foreign exchange transactions; that under this act he ordered all gold and gold certificates to be delivered at the Treasury; embargoed gold, fixed restrictions on the banking business of Federal Reserve members, passes on the reorganization of national banks; permits the purchase of preferred bank stock by the R.F.C.; regulates bank loans and permits the issuance of a large amount of new Federal Reserve bank notes on collateral not heretofore allowed as a currency base.

By the Economy Act there was delivered into the hands of the President the power to revamp the entire structure of veterans' benefits, to reduce all Federal salaries 15 percent, to eliminate, to consolidate, transfer, and curtail any governmental agency.

By the Farm Relief Act there was delivered into the hands of the President the power to reduce acreage, to specify the growing of farm crops on certain terms, to employ the allotment and land-leasing and cotton-option contracts on any of them, to buy the Farm Board's cotton or make loans against it, to enter into marketing agreements, to levy taxes on processing and require licenses for processors and distributors, to control the distribution of basic farm commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, in short, to practically regiment agriculture.

This Congress has delegated power to the President to direct credit expansion through purchase of Government bonds not to exceed $3,000,000,000 through open-market operations; to issue greenbacks up to $3,000,000,000 if the credit expansion does not work; by proclamation to fix the gold content of the dollar within certain limits; to provide for the unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio to be fixed by proclamation.

And we might go on multiplying examples of this wholesale delegation of power. There are many others.

Moreover, we have been given definite indication of what the administration has in mind for future legislation and action whereunder additional powers will be surrendered by Congress and delegated to the executive branch of the Government. We see the beginnings of an effort to establish central control over communications, including the telephone and telegraph lines and the radio. In that connection liberty-loving Americans are shocked by the deadly calm with which the Secretary of Agriculture, in his pamphlet, "America Must Choose", after discussing regimentation of agriculture, announces:

But these are minor considerations, in comparison with the extraordinary complete control of all the agencies of public opinion which is generally necessary to keep the national will at a tensy necessary to carry through a program of isolated prosperity.

Freedom of the press? Not under regimented opinion.

The Secretary of Agriculture is one of the spokesmen for the administration, and it is commonly reported that the Secretary, along with Professor Tugwell, had much to do with drafting this tariff bill. Let us quote a little more at length from his pamphlet in order to learn the trend of political economic thought prevailing and becoming so dominant:

Much as we all dislike them, the new types of social control that we have now in operation are here to stay. * * * By the end of 1934 we shall probably have taken 15,000,000 acres out of cotton, 20,000,000 acres out of corn, and about half a million acres out of tobacco, nearly one eighth of all the crop land now harvested in the United States.

If we continue year after year with only 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 acres of cotton in the South, instead of 40,000,000 acres or 45,000,000 acres, it may be necessary after a time to shift part of the southern population. We will find exactly the same dilemma, although not on quite such a great scale, in the Corn and Wheat Belts.

If we finally go all the way toward nationalism, it may be necessary to have compulsory control of marketing, licensing of plowed land, and base and surplus quotas, for every farmer for every product for each month in the year. We may have to have Government control of all surpluses, and a far greater degree of public ownership than we have now. It may be necessary to make a public utility out of agriculture. * * * Every plowed field would have its permit sticking upon its post.

DISCIPLINE NEEDED

As yet we have applied in this country only the barest beginnings of the sort of social discipline which a completely determined nationalism requires. * * * It is quite as serious a question whether we have the resolution and staying power to swallow all the words and deeds of our robust individualist past, and submit to a completely armylike, nationalist discipline in peace time.

Our own maneuvers of social discipline to date have been mildly persuasive and democratic. * * * Regimentation without stint might indeed, I sometimes think, go further and faster here than anywhere else. * * * Great prosperity is possible for the United States if we follow the strictly nationalist course, but in such case we must be prepared for a fundamental planning and regimentation of agriculture and industry far beyond that which anyone has yet suggested. To carry out such a program effectively, with our public psychology as it is, may require a unanimity of opinion and disciplined action even greater than that which we experienced in the years 1917-19. * * * It may require a great amount of governmental aid to take care of people formerly engaged in import and export businesses. It will mean the shifting of millions of people from the farms of the South. But these are minor considerations, in comparison with the extraordinarily complete control of all the agencies of public opinion which is generally necessary to keep the national will at a tensy necessary to carry through a program of isolated prosperity.

Thus there seems to be more truth than poetry in the assertion on the part of many able students of governmental affairs and economists that we are undergoing what some choose to term "a palace revolution." In that connection our thoughts are arrested by the article of Mark Sullivan appearing on March 4, 1934, in a New York publication, wherein he said:

It is certain that the revolution now under way cannot go on to completion except by getting rid of the independence of the judiciary. The revolution cannot be made effective except by getting rid of the freedom of the press and by suppressing and punishing dissent and nonformity as thoroughly as they were suppressed during the World War. The revolution cannot go on to completion except by getting rid of the parliamentary form of government; and these are but three of the fundamental American institutions that must pass away if the revolution is to be complete and remain permanent.

Scattered all through the so-called "emergency legislation" which this Congress has passed, there exists the right to exercise peremptory legislative powers by the President. This tariff bill is no exception. Under this tariff-making power the President may decide without hearings that a certain industry has procured its tariff from Congress through a lobby or collusive bargaining and forthwith by a stroke of the pen completely wipe out the industry. If it be said that the President will not abuse the power, sufficient answer is found in the peremptory action canceling air-mail contracts.

This tariff bill is brought here under the guise of emergency legislation. It recites that it is based on the present emergency. Expediency has been made a rule of construction in the interpretation of the Constitution. The direful prophecy of President Andrew Jackson in his veto message of May 7, 1830, has been fulfilled. He said:

When an honest observance of constitutional compacts cannot be obtained from communities like ours, it need not be anticipated elsewhere, and the cause in which there has been so much martyrdom, and from which so much was expected by the friends of liberty, may be abandoned, and the degrading truth that man is unfit for self-government admitted. And this will be the case if expediency be made a rule of construction in interpreting the Constitution. Power in no government could desire a better shield for the insidious advances which it is ever ready to make upon the checks that are designed to restrain its action.

President George Washington spoke clearly on this point in his Farewell Address when he said:

If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way in which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

This tariff bill is a repudiation of tariff policies laid down by Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, to whom the Democratic party steadfastly points as the founders of its faith. Thomas Jefferson said:

My own idea is that we should encourage home manufacturers to the extent of our own consumption of everything of which we raise the raw materials. * * *. Experience has taught me that manufactures are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

Andrew Jackson in a speech in the United States Senate said:

We have been too long subject to the policy of British merchants. It is time we should become a little more Americanized; and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England, feed our own; or else in a short time by continuing our present policy (that under the low tariff of 1816) we shall all be rendered paupers ourselves.

If this bill becomes the law home manufacturers will not be encouraged, but on the contrary many of them will be wiped out entirely. If this bill becomes the law we will have lost a large part of our economic independence; and we will be feeding the paupers and laborers of England and of Japan and other foreign nations and we shall render paupers of increasing numbers of our own people.

We must have an adequate tariff because (1) American labor, industry, and agriculture must be protected against cheap sweat shop and peasant labor and low living standards of foreign competitors and (2) because it is a means of providing revenue for the Government. That is sound Republican doctrine and the Democrats recognize it as such, for the distinguished Speaker of this House in a debate on the Hawley-Smoot Act on January 9, 1932, said:

Lower this tariff drastically? You (Republicans) will not do it and we (Democrats) do not dare to do it with conditions as they are. We do not want this market flooded with the products of cheap labor in other countries.

To permit European and other foreign manufacturers, in the present crisis, to sell more freely in our domestic markets—to sell what we already produce excessively—is to shut out our own manufactures—to complicate tremendously the problem of reorganizing its chaos.

The internationalists propose to cure the chaos of our domestic market by converting it into a world market. If our international bankers determine our foreign policy, then our domestic market must stay disorganized. They would lower our tariff and allow Europe to pay on their investments by flooding our domestic market with more surpluses.

Never has there been a time when we could so little afford to lower our tariff walls, behind which we already suffer from demoralizing surpluses, to permit more surpluses to flood us.

Very much in point with the subject under discussion is a telegram which I have received from the California State Chamber of Commerce, and I ask consent that it may be inserted here as a part of my remarks.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., March 23, 1934.

HON. RALPH R. ELTSE,

House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

The California State Chamber of Commerce is of opinion that flexible provisions of Tariff Act of 1930 provide Tariff Commission and President with all necessary means of changing tariff schedules to meet changing conditions. Congressional H.R. 8430 proposes to give President power to change tariff schedules 50 percent by reciprocity treaties with other nations and without hearings. Such power would affect numerous tariff schedules vital to California. California State chamber is opposed to vesting such broad power in any individual, and believes it would result in uncertainty that would be extremely detrimental and disturbing to California agriculture. No changes should be made in tariff schedules without thorough investigation by Tariff Commission with adequate hearings. Proposed legislation would furnish opportunity for political pressure to be exerted in such way as to favor large industries of wide political influence at expense of small industries of less political influence. California State chamber urges that H.R. 8430 be not passed in view of fact that Tariff Commission and President already have power for adjustments with provision for full hearing by all interested parties.

NORMAN H. SLOANE,

General Manager California State Chamber of Commerce.

The passage of this bill will have one inevitable result: American labor, industry, and agriculture will suffer.

Let us more minutely examine the operation of this bill and note the result which will follow. As the tariff law now stands, articles are either on the dutiable or free list. The dutiable list is composed of those articles which come into competition with American products, while the free list is composed of noncompeting articles. It can be assumed that since it is one of the express purposes of this bill to promote foreign trade, the free list will not be disturbed by Executive order or reciprocal agreements. Consequently, any such order or agreement must be directed at or cover items on the dutiable list.

Now, under the power proposed to be granted to the President under this bill, he would enter into bargaining or swapping agreements with foreign nations for the exchange of commodities through the medium of export and import. If this delegation of power means anything at all, it means that the tariff on many dutiable items will be lowered in consideration of receiving from the other party to the agreement certain of its products which, under the circumstances, will necessarily come into competition with American grown and manufactured products. The power to determine what American products shall thus summarily be dealt with lies solely in the hands of the President. Therefore it is no empty statement to say that this bill delegates to the President unrestricted power over the life or death of any unit or section of American industry and agriculture. And Secretary Wallace, who must be considered a spokesman for the administration, has provided us with the rule or the yardstick by which it is to be determined whether or not a certain given industry shall have the decree of life or death pronounced upon it. That rule or yardstick is that of efficiency or inefficiency, as you choose.

In order to build up our exports under the application of that rule our shoe manufacturers will be told that they are inefficient as a reason for allowing our domestic markets to be flooded with cheap shoes manufactured in Czechoslovakia; for the same purpose our textile industries will be told that they are inefficient as a reason for allowing our domestic markets to be flooded with cheap textiles manufactured in Great Britain and other foreign nations; under the application of that rule the manufactures of woolen and worsted goods, of glass, of women's clothing, of pottery, of cement, of electric-light bulbs, of electrical appliances, and the producers of our agricultural products may be told that they are inefficient as a reason for allowing our domestic markets to be flooded with the cheap products from foreign nations. Under the application of that rule the cane- and beet-sugar industry in the United States is to be told that it is inefficient as a reason for allowing our domestic markets to be flooded with the cheap sugar produced in Cuba and elsewhere. Under the application of that rule there is not a single manufactured article or any agricultural product produced in the United States which could successfully compete with a like production of a foreign nation.

The unit cost of production of any given article abroad is much lower than it is in the United States, and, of course, such unit cost enters into the test of whether an article is efficiently or inefficiently produced. It is impossible under such a test for any given article to successfully compete because of the pitiful wages paid by our foreign competitors and of the low standards of living prevailing in foreign nations. Comparison of wages in the United States and leading competing foreign countries provides conclusive proof that we cannot compete successfully with those foreign nations under the application of the efficiency or inefficiency rule. Pass this bill and American labor, agriculture, and industry will no longer be protected. The American farmer with his higher costs, higher-priced land, and higher standards of living cannot compete with the foreign farmer with his lower cost, cheaper land, and lower standards of living without an adequate tariff. This was demonstrated under the Democratic Underwood Tariff Act, where a large percentage of American farm products was placed on the free list and rates on manufactured goods in general were greatly reduced. The result was logical and inevitable. Each month saw increased quantities of cheaply produced European agricultural and industrial products invading the American market, forcing our industries to curtail activities or close down entirely. It deprived American agriculture of a dependable and profitable market. Our exports declined 43.3 percent in 10 months immediately following the passage of that act.

And yet it is proposed that the American domestic question of the tariff shall be settled at a conference table with foreign nations. We are to be embroiled in all of the economic and commercial wars of Europe and the rest of the world through international conferences on tariff duties and reciprocal trade agreements. Think of permitting foreign nations with their vast quantity of cheap surplus competitive products seeking entrance into our markets to have a voice in determining what our tariff shall be.

If it is to be the policy of the Government to negotiate treaties, the practice followed in the past should be continued, and that practice was well defined in the recommendations of President Theodore Roosevelt in his annual message to Congress in 1901, where he said:

Reciprocity must be treated as the handmaiden of protection. Our first duty is to see that the protection granted by the tariff in every case where it is needed is maintained, and that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries. Just how far this is must be determined according to the individual case, remembering always that every application of our tariff policy to meet our shifting national needs must be conditioned upon the cardinal fact that the duties must never be reduced below the point that will cover the difference between the labor cost here and abroad. The well-being of the wage worker is a prime consideration of our entire policy of economic legislation.

This bill stands in glaring inconsistency with the administration program of curtailment in production and elimination of surpluses. Under the farm-relief act we established the processing tax for basic agricultural products. New items are being added to these basic products and the operation of the act extended for the benefit of the agriculturist at the expense of the consumer. The burden of the farmer is being saddled on the back of the consumer. The problem of the farmer is being laid on the doorstep of the consumer; it is not solved, it is shifted. In the face of the dire need, privation, and suffering by millions of our people in a land flowing with milk and honey, every third row of cotton has been plowed under, millions of pigs have been slaughtered, acreage in many other crops has been tremendously reduced in an effort to cut down and limit production. This program has been developed and instituted in order to eliminate surpluses of such basic agricultural products and to raise prices. And in addition it is proposed to further reduce cotton production through the means of a heavy penalizing excise tax on cotton baleage, confiscatory in nature. All agriculture is being regimeted with the foregoing purpose in mind.

But behold the inconsistency. On the one hand we propose to thus curtail production, while on the other hand it is proposed under this tariff bill to permit products grown on foreign soil to have entry through our ports and such products will come into direct competition with our own agricultural products, and we have a clash of purposes and inconsistent objectives. Any products which we cannot efficiently grow as compared with those grown on foreign soil, are to be let into the country if we are to apply the rule or yardstick adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Comparable to the inconsistency of this tariff bill with production curtailment is the illogical argument of the sponsors of this bill.

In order to prove the necessity for the passage of this tariff bill its sponsors point to the terrific falling off in exports and imports and argue that passage of the bill will again restore the export and import business. They make comparison of present imports and exports with those of the banner year of 1929 and years immediately prior thereto. In so doing they fall into error. The terrific export business for the year 1929 and prior years was financed and our products purchased through the means of loans which our people and the Government made to the foreign nations purchasing heavily in our markets. As Mr. Samuel Crowther testified before the Ways and Means Committee:

Now, we can have an export trade if we want to pay both ends of it.

Moreover, comparison of present export-import business with that of 1929 and prior years is odious because it assumes that the export and import business of foreign nations had not retrogressed, whereas in fact this business of the foreign nations had fallen off commensurate with that of our own. The truth is that the terrific decrease in the export-import business of the whole world was a result of the depression and not a cause. Foreign nations had become and are now essentially nationalistic and each is trying insofar as possible to become self-contained, and to do that they have built up their high tariff walls, and these are not retaliatory as so often charged. It has become the question of the survival of the fit.

Moreover the foreign nations to which we have heretofore exported such vast quantities of our products are terrifically in debt to the United States and they do not care to increase that debt burden. To buy in our markets and to establish a trade balance in our favor would only increase their debt burdens. Naturally, they will not do this, and consequently they have set up their tariff walls. No foreign nation is going to enter into any reciprocal trade agreement with us unless it is to its advantage, which will prove to be at our expense.

In conclusion, I wish to respectfully submit that it is high time that we call an abrupt halt to a further granting of legislative powers to the executive branch of the Government; that this Congress stop its march toward abdication of constitutional powers; that it reassert itself as the duly constituted representative body of the American people; that it resume its normal functioning; that it be wise enough to use the words of Chief Justice Hughes, "to see that the hope of the Republic is not in submission but in controversy—in the triumphs won through high and free debate."

This Congress must retrieve its position so that it can no longer be said that "representative government is dead."

It is time that we turn abruptly to the right. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a telegram from the State Chamber of Commerce in California and also certain quotations from the Washington Post and the Washington Star.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, this Nation must choose—must choose between the "brain trust" and common horse sense—must choose between internationalism and nationalism—must choose between seeing and buying America first and sojourning and bartering away our markets in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, and in other foreign countries. For my part, I find no great difficulty in choosing. I choose the course outlined by George Washington, the Father of this country, nationalism—real Americanism—rather than internationalism, that of the Latter Day Saints, the "brain trust." These have and are destroying this splendid administration of ours—the administration that started in so gloriously on March 4, 1933.

We are told that this Nation is on the brink of destruction, and I agree—not only is it on the brink, but it has been on the brink for several years. It was on the brink when this administration took charge, but why have we not taken it off of the brink—we have been at it for over a year. The answer is because we permitted the intellectual imbeciles known as the "brain trust", who were not elected Members of Congress, to write the Nation's laws. We would long ago have been off of the brink if we had followed the young Democratic colts who were newly elected in the last election—who came fresh from the soil and fresh from the people, and who had vision and foresight, but unfortunately we adopted as a national policy the lunacy of the "brain trust."

We also are warned not to rock the boat—to blindly follow the "brain trust" to destruction. I refuse to follow. We cannot save the Ship of State by blindly piling more "brain trust" rubbish into the boat. It is already on the verge of sinking with such rubbish as the Economy Act, the refinancing of farm indebtedness, the allotment plan, the regimentation of agriculture, subsistence homesteads, and submarginal lands. We cannot save the Ship of State by nipping a nickel from the men and women who work for the Government nor by the shameful and disgraceful manner in which we have treated the veterans of foreign wars while at the same time we have squandered billions and are plunging this Nation some thirty-two billions in the red by the end of this year.

Nor can we remedy our lot by giving to the "brain trust" the absolute power to fix the tariff and barter away the domestic market of the farmers in the interest of our international manufacturers. Some of these "brain trusters" are now being accused of infidelity and disloyalty to the administration. Some of my friends are afraid that they will go Stalin. No danger—they may go Hitler or Mussolini. They are internationalistic, but they will never go Stalin. They believe in an international capitalistic dictatorship but not a Stalin dictatorship. They are the products and tools of the coupon clippers and have as little use for a Stalin government as they have for the Government of the United States. Their aim is to go back to the eleventh century—to the feudal age, and establish a feudal system in which the farmers and laboring people will be the feudal serfs and they the lords and barons here in Washington.

The internationalism in the speeches and pamphlets and articles, and in the testimony before House committees of the Secretary of Agriculture and of members of the "brain trust" alarm me. According to these, the Secretary of Agriculture and the "brain trust" are more interested in the welfare of foreign than of our own people. I fear for the independence, the freedom, the protection, and the prosperity of the American farmers. First, the Government assures the farmers that it will systematically help them in a voluntary reduction of their surplus crops. Next, the same Government decides to order the farmers to reduce their acreage, whether they want to or not, with or without land rentals or benefit payments, and makes them criminals with fines and penitentiary sentences if they continue to farm their own land according to their own dictates. The so-called "50-percent tax" of the price of cotton imposed by the bill passed here recently is not a tax but a fine. Why not call it a fine? This is the beginning of a feudal system.

Next we are told that hundreds and thousands of farmers and their families are to be told that they are on submarginal land and that their land will be condemned and they will be moved to subsistence homesteads—"sub" means "below"; "subsistence", below existence. We are to be taxed new billions of dollars to buy this land, not from the farmers but from the mortgage holders who are to be given something better than a mortgage in exchange—an interest-bearing, tax-exempt Government bond. These people have chosen their own homes. They know where they want to live. They feel injured when they are told that they are on submarginal land and are to be removed and their homes, schools, churches, and other community buildings abandoned. As part of this program, an attempt was made to destroy the dry-land agricultural stations by withholding appropriations, but the administration would not stand for that.

Now the tariff is to be reduced and the American market opened to the peasant farmers, serfs, and peons of other lands. The products of the tropics are to be substituted for those of our own Temperate Zone. We are told that the people know nothing about the tariff and that their chosen representatives in Congress may not act wisely. Therefore, we are asked in the bill here under consideration to turn the making of tariffs over to the "brain trust" and permit them to determine what branches of agriculture or industry are worth saving, which are inefficient, which shall be abandoned. We are told that perhaps it may be necessary to abandon 40,000,000 acres of farm land in order to get more foreign trade for our international manufacturers.

Let us turn to the report of the Department of Commerce and we find that during 1933, when our imports were at the lowest level since 1913, we imported products equivalent to 40,000,000 acres of land. It is true that some of these cannot be produced in this country to advantage, such as rubber, coffee, tea, cocoa, bananas, some spices, and some textiles. But the great bulk of these imports did and do displace American agricultural products which can be economically and efficiently produced here at home—but not without protection unless we want our farmers to be reduced to peonage and serfdom.

An examination of the reports of the Department of Commerce shows that in 1933 our imports in the first five groups of commodities, which include those of farm origin, were as follows:

General imports of merchandise by articles, 1933

Animals and animal products, edible.....	$44,421,306
Animals and animal products, inedible.....	117,747,285
Vegetable food products and beverages.....	372,437,696
Vegetable products, inedible (except fibers and wood).....	160,002,244
Fibers and textiles.....	270,451,651
Total.....	965,060,182

For the sake of argument, let us deduct the large items which we cannot produce at home to advantage—although rayon, an American product, could and should be substituted for silk. The more obvious ones are:

General imports, 1933

Silk, unmanufactured.....	$103,594,564
Silk, manufactures of.....	6,282,604
Bananas.....	20,204,698
Rubber, and manufactures of.....	51,517,940
Spices of all kinds.....	7,984,296
Coffee, tea, and cocoa.....	156,956,095
Total.....	346,540,197
Add for good measure for miscellaneous products.....	19,019,985
Grand total.....	365,560,182

This still leaves the value of the net balance of imports of products of agricultural origin, $600,000,000. Taking the average of all American farm land, the farmers do not average more than $15 an acre for their products. Thus it would require 40,000,000 acres to produce the $600,000,000 worth of farm products imported over and above the chief things, which we need not consider because they have not as yet been developed in this country; that is, the coffee, tea, cocoa, rubber, silk, bananas, and miscellaneous products up to about $20,000,000, which we have thrown in for good measure.

Even if we throw in another $100,000,000 for imports which may be in the doubtful class, our imports of farm products, of the kind grown on our farms, were valued at over a half billion dollars in 1933. This is the foreign value. American values would bring it up to $750,000,000. We must remember that these imported products set the lower price level for all the products produced by our own farmers. If we would raise our prices, we must first learn to control the prices of these foreign competitive farm products.

In 1933 we imported farm animals and meat products in excess of $10,000,000—dairy products in excess of another $10,000,000. During the same period I find we imported fish valued at $22,000,000 and other edible animal products at over $2,000,000, all competing with our livestock, dairy, and poultry industries. While our farmers were paid little or nothing for cattle, horse, and sheep hides, our imports of raw hides and skins amounted to over $45,000,000. It is true that we have a tariff of 10 percent on hides and skins but that 10 percent does not measure the difference between our standard of living and the standards of other countries.

Again, in 1933 we imported leather and leather products amounting to $18,425,350. The imports of furs and fur goods amounted to $38,000,000, and animal oils and fats and animal products amounted to another $15,000,000. All of these products could have been and were, as a matter of fact, economically and efficiently produced by our own farmers, but many of them were permitted to waste on the farms because of low prices.

It is ridiculous that we should have imported nearly $15,000,000 worth of grains and grain preparations in 1933. While limiting the rice crop, we imported 30,000,000 pounds of rice. While limiting the farm acreage for wheat and rye, we imported 10,000,000 bushels of rye which displaced a million acres of rye or wheat in my own State, and imports of barley malt alone exceeded a hundred million pounds. In addition, we imported about $4,000,000 worth of hay and feed crops. The farmers of this Nation are asked to allow their lands to lie idle and pay taxes on them so that we may import agricultural products in order to stimulate trade for the international manufacturers.

Our vegetable farmers are also at the mercy of foreign producers. We imported over $15,000,000 of vegetables and vegetable preparations in 1933. The list shows everything from potatoes and tomatoes to peas and beans, all of which could have been successfully and economically produced on our own farms.

The fruit farmers are in the same predicament. We imported in 1933 nearly $30,000,000 of fruit and fruit preparations, all of which could have been and should have been produced in our own orchards. Again, we imported over $8,500,000 worth of nuts, the larger amount of which were of the kinds that have been for years grown efficiently and economically in this country. And, in addition, we imported corn oil, peanut oil, sunflower seeds, and so forth, to the amount of $7,800,000, all of which were used in competition with similar products of our own farmers.

We come now to sugar. Our imports in 1933 were valued at $114,272,830. This does not include sugar from the Territories of Hawaii and Puerto Rico, which are permanent parts of the United States. The United States now has over a million acres in sugar and last year produced an average of 3,275 pounds of refined sugar per acre at a cost of less than 4 cents per pound in the bag. This means 5-cent sugar to the consumer in 10-pound bags. The truth is that our own sugar producers have broken the monopoly enjoyed by foreign producers and have, in fact, brought down the price of sugar to the consumer, and a reasonable tariff on sugar protects both the producers and the public from exploitation. Our producers cannot produce as cheaply as Cuba and the Philippines because of the higher standard of living. On the other hand, they can prevent a monopoly.

Our farmers now produce from 20 to 25 percent more sugar per acre than the sugar-beet farmers of Europe. In place of destroying or restricting the sugar production, we should increase it. Therefore, our beet-sugar industry should be expanded from two to three million acres rather than reduced below 1,000,000 acres. We should produce 100 percent of our domestic consumption in place of only 40 percent. The only reason Cuba can sell in our market and bring distress to our sugar farmers is because of her low standard of living and starvation wages.

We also imported some $15,000,000 of alcoholic and other beverages in 1933. In 1934 this amount will be greatly increased. If we must drink, why not drink America? Why not use American beverages? If we must have wines and other liquors, why not use those made from American products? Again, we imported gum, resin, balsam, drugs, herbs, leaves, roots, and so forth, to an amount of $12,000,000. Our people can and ought to produce practically all of these; they are a legitimate source of farm income. Why not keep that $12,000,000 in the United States?

To the flaxseed growers may I state that last year we imported flaxseed, tungseed, linseed, and perilla oil to the extent of $20,000,000. All of these are used in varnishes and paints. Therefore, in place of reducing our flaxseed acreage, we should increase by two or three million acres the production of paint and varnish oil seeds, because the imports of twenty million will be more than tripled when we again have a sufficient medium of exchange so that we can paint our homes and buildings. The farmers producing flaxseed must not be sacrificed in order to get trade for the international manufacturers.

Again, in 1933 we imported 58,000,000 pounds of fresh tomatoes. Do our friends in Florida and Texas wish to surrender that market to Cuba and Mexico? It has been said that winter vegetable growing, like sugar and flaxseed, was not economically sound. We also imported 76,000,000 pounds of canned tomatoes. Tomatoes are grown and canned in every State of this Union. Is canning also uneconomical? And in addition we imported 10,000,000 pounds of tomato paste. Do our friends, especially those in Maryland and California, feel that this market should also be abandoned to foreign countries to create trade for a few?

In addition, we imported some 60,000 pounds of canned meats and meat products equivalent to 250,000 head of cattle. Most of the canned meat was imported from the Argentine, and up until October last, some of it was used by our Army and C.C.C. camps. Thus we supplied our American boys, working on American projects in the interior of our country, the cheap canned meat of old cows and bulls produced by peons in the Argentine at about 1 cent per pound live weight and 2 cents per pound dressed, and which meats were invoiced at about 6½ cents per pound and placed in competition with the better grade meats that many of the parents of these same boys produced in this country. Surely we do not wish to increase these imports. I cannot cover in detail the fields of tobacco, cotton, wool, and other miscellaneous groups. They are just as important as those I have mentioned.

There is no reason why we should get from foreign countries, including the Tropics, these hundreds and millions of dollars worth of farm products which we can grow economically and efficiently. We have the land, the rainfall, the heat, the sunshine, the farmers, the skill, and the knowledge. Shall we surrender to the low standards of living of other lands and other peoples? If so, who is to decide what to abandon first, second, and third? I say Congress and Congress alone must decide. Members of Congress can tell of the needs of their State or district. We must not surrender to the "brain trust."

It is claimed that this bill gives the power to lower tariffs to the President and not to the "brain trust." I know, and you know, that the President cannot attend to this. He has too many other administrative duties that require his attention. He will have to delegate that power to someone. If such power were granted at all, it should be granted to the Tariff Commission, who have knowledge of the subject.

While I have the greatest confidence in the President, still, even if he should attend to it personally, I would not be willing to give him this power. The United States of America is too large, too many cross currents, and too many interests in different localities. No one man can represent them all. I would not even have been willing to grant this power to President Lincoln or President Jefferson, the two greatest Presidents we have ever had and perhaps ever will have, although in their time the United States was not so large and so involved commercially, financially, and industrially. The power of regulating tariffs can be best performed by the Members of Congress who represent their individual States and districts.

Let us see who is backing this bill. I have before me a pamphlet entitled "American Manufacturers' Export Trade, 330 West Forty-second Street, New York City." This pamphlet has undoubtedly been mailed to every Member of Congress. In a letter accompanying this pamphlet we find this statement:

This association urges your support of the President's request for authority to negotiate reciprocal trade treaties under provisions embodied in bill H.R. 8430. We formerly passed a resolution urging such power be given the President in May 1933.

On page 3 of the pamphlet we find the following paragraph:

The United States has over $15,500,000,000 of foreign investments, represented to a large extent by stocks and bonds distributed far and wide among thousands of American investors, including institutions such as banks, insurance companies, universities, etc., as well as individual holders, large and small. In addition, foreign governments owe this Government $11,000,000,000 on account of war debts.

Again on page 4, we find this paragraph:

Since the United States cannot isolate itself from the rest of the world; since we have projected a credit balance abroad in the form of money and goods to the extent of $26,000,000,000; it follows that America's interests demand the development of a foreign policy—governmental, financial, and commercial—that will prevent further huge losses to American investors and taxpayers and that will foster our foreign trade to the benefit of American capital and labor.

From the above statement by the international manufacturers, it is seen clearly that what they have in mind is to enter into trade agreements with foreign nations in such a way that the balance of trade will be against us in a sufficient amount to take care of the $26,000,000,000 that the European nations owe to this Government and to the international bankers, and in addition, give a foreign market to the products of these international manufacturers. In other words, they wish to protect the $15,500,000,000 that our capitalists have invested in foreign countries and, in addition, get back for our Government the $11,000,000,000 that our international bankers bet on the wrong horse before we entered the war and that they juggled onto the shoulders of Uncle Sam. This at the expense of the American investor who invested at home and at the expense of American agriculture. That is their motive for supporting this bill. Hypocritically they say "for the benefit of American capital and American labor." Yes, for American capital invested in foreign lands and for the crucifixion of labor on the altar of the lowest foreign standard of living.

There is no question but what the "brain trust" would like cheaper food and foreign trade for New York and other coastal cities. They would subsidize the merchant marine, so that water freight would be low and at the same time boost railroad rates out West to the limit, forgetting that there are over a hundred million people west of New York. These people are New York's best market. If New York does not buy from our farmers and surrenders our market to foreign countries, we cannot buy from New York. Let us get reasonable prices for our own farm products. Let us get our own people back to work. Let us not forget that the $600,000,000 of foreign agricultural imports would have meant $600 cash for each of 1,000,000 farmers above the food, fuel, and shelter which they get on the farms at present. Let us take care of our own nationalists—American markets, as far as possible, for Americans.

In conclusion I will state that I favor the reduction of tariff wherever it is too high. I favor a tariff that will protect all American products, industrial or agricultural, at a price equal to the cost of production plus transportation and storage charges plus 6 percent at the point of competition. Such a tariff would protect the American wage earner and the American standard of living and would be fair to the consuming public.

The pamphlet that I have referred to above clearly shows that the international manufacturers are back of this bill. I give below their application for membership and a list of their officers and directors and their connection, so that the Members may know who and what interests are in the background of this legislation.

APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP

To the AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS EXPORT ASSOCIATION,
330 West Forty-second Street, New York, N.Y.:

We hereby offer to cooperate with the other members of the American Manufacturers Export Association in fostering our foreign trade, overcoming the obstacles that may be placed in its way, promoting legislation favorable to exports, and in maintaining the highest standard of American business ethics abroad.

We agree to pay toward the expenses of this cooperation the following annual sum: $-----

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there are few Members of this House who do not agree that it is desirable to increase our international trade just as it is desirable to increase our domestic trade. When it comes, however, to determining just how and under what circumstances this should be done there is, of course, room for a considerable difference of opinion. I am not one of those who believe that our past tariff policy has been responsible for the world decline in foreign trade. Neither do I believe that the Smoot-Hawley bill has been responsible for the decline in our foreign trade, the best evidence of this being that the decline in value of imports on the free list has been greater than the decline in value of dutiable articles. If every country had followed as honest and sensible a course as we have in the matter of tariffs, there could certainly be no legitimate complaints by anyone. The chief cause of the decline in trade among nations, in addition to the lower level of prices, lies in the fact that other nations have put into effect systems of quotas, permits, licenses, exchange control, and other export schemes for stopping up the channels of trade. In spite of the fact that this is admittedly true, we are asked to pass this legislation which would only complicate the situation by making this Nation a party to the system which has already done so much harm to international commerce. If it is our sincere desire to bring about an improvement in the conduct of international trade relations, then it seems to me that instead of imitating methods and practices of other nations, we should be doing what we can to bring about an abandonment of those policies.

There are, of course, many reasons for opposing this legislation. Many of us object to a further surrender by Congress of the powers given it by the Constitution, particularly that most important power of levying taxes. Some feel that this legislation will be a hindrance to recovery by reason of the fact that it will increase business uncertainty and will place every industry which has tariff protection in a position where it may suffer utter destruction through summary action and without opportunity to be heard.

All of these matters have been thoroughly discussed by those who have preceded me in a fashion so much better than I could do that even if I had the time I would hesitate to enter into a further discussion of them at this moment.

Instead, I wish to largely confine my remarks to the effect which this legislation is likely to have on the industry of agriculture. Coming from the great Middle West and representing one of the more important agricultural districts of the country, I am naturally interested in this question. It happens that I come from a district whose principal agricultural product has to a considerable extent gone into export channels in the past. My district is the greatest wheat-producing district in the United States, and if the effect of the measure would be to increase our exports of wheat and other surplus crops, my district would presumably benefit. Such a study as I have been able to make of the matter, however, convinces me that this measure affords little or no opportunity to increase our exports of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and lard, which have been our principal agricultural exports in the recent past, and I fear that in attempting to do so through this type of legislation we are taking a great chance of losing protection upon many agricultural products upon which we are on an import basis, such as sugar beets, flax, wool, beef, and some types of dairy products and fresh fruits and vegetables.

Because I represent such a great wheat-growing district, I want to point out briefly the situation which affects international trade in that commodity today. While we have a surplus of wheat in this country and export markets are much to be desired, yet it is literally true that even by offering to lend money to foreign nations with which to purchase our wheat and by paying an export bounty, which at the present time amounts to about 28 cents a bushel, we are unable to dispose of any excepting the smallest quantities of this product. For the past several months we have not exported a single bushel of American wheat which was not subsidized. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has arranged to make loans to China for the purchase of wheat and yet the best that we have been able to do in sending wheat into that market where millions and millions of people are undernourished is to dispose of something like 10,000,000 bushels, upon which there has been paid a subsidy amounting to an average of 22 cents per bushel. In all, through the medium of this subsidy, we have been able to export 22,000,000 bushels of wheat from the Pacific Northwest, a considerable part of which, however, instead of going into foreign markets has been carried through the Panama Canal and sold in markets in the southeast part of the United States in competition with wheat from the Middle West.

Consider how present wheat prices in this country compare with the world market. The price of May futures in Chicago on Saturday last was 87½ cents. On the same date May futures in Winnipeg closed at 68½ cents, practically 20 cents difference. The price in Liverpool of the same date was 67 cents. Inasmuch as it costs approximately 15 cents to get a bushel of wheat from Chicago to Liverpool, our prices were 35 cents above the world market. Obviously under those conditions exports are impossible, and if American prices should by any chance drop to the world level it would mean that while we might be able to export some wheat the price which the Kansas farmer would receive on his farm would be little more than 30 cents per bushel. Of course, the time is never going to come when we can afford to grow and sell wheat in this country for that price.

There is no product in the world today in the marketing of which there is more competition than wheat. That competition is going to continue and perhaps become even more intense. During the past 30 years Canada has increased its wheat acreage 375 percent; Argentina has increased its acreage 250 percent; and Australia 350 percent. In none of these countries has the limit of expansion been reached as yet, and competent authorities estimate that all of these countries can extend their wheat acreage at costs which are far below our production costs in the United States. This leaves Russia out of consideration entirely, and yet we know that the possibilities for increasing the production in that country are very great.

The above figures have not taken into consideration the matter of transportation rates. The American farmer suffers a tremendous handicap in this respect due to the fact that the wheat producing areas of our three principal competing countries not only have lower freight rates, but are near water transportation.

Not only have we suffered from the intense competition offered by other exporting countries but every importing country has offered inducements to its producers which have resulted in great increases in production so that the world market for wheat has become more and more restricted. It, therefore, appears that for a long time to come there is no possibility that we shall find an export market for wheat except at prices which are far below the cost of production in this country.

Leaving wheat, let us consider what the possibilities are as to finding a market for surplus lard. It is true we were formerly able to dispose of a considerable quantity of our packing-house lard in central Europe. We have lost that market today, however, and in view of the competition of whale and fish oils and tropical vegetable oils it seems impossible that we shall be able to regain a market for lard at a price which will pay the cost of production in this country.

As far as cotton and tobacco are concerned, it is generally admitted, I am sure, that reciprocal tariff arrangements would not be of any assistance in finding markets. Those of you who have read the hearings will recall the statement of Secretary Wallace before the committee, where, in response to the question:

Now, do you see any way through trade agreements by which we can sell more cotton, for instance, to Great Britain?

Mr. Wallace replied:

Speaking for my own part, I don't see where trade agreements would enter into the cotton situation to any material degree, because cotton moves abroad anyway. We would not be getting any benefit by exchanging, well, say, cotton for champagne, which was the illustration used this morning, I believe, because France would be buying cotton anyway. It would not bring about expansion to do that.

What Secretary Wallace says with regard to cotton is, of course, equally applicable to those types of tobacco which we grow for export.

It would seem, therefore, that the possibility of securing further markets for our agricultural products, of which we have been producing an exportable surplus, is quite remote, if not utterly out of the question. That brings us to the other half of the equation, namely, whether the attempt to increase foreign trade through reciprocal tariffs might not do serious injury to branches of agriculture which are not on an export basis. In this connection we cannot overlook the policy of this administration toward agricultural tariffs as revealed by instances which have recently taken place. The policy of the administration toward the beet- and cane-sugar industry has been the subject of frequent discussion here on the floor and is too well-known to require further comment at this time. In connection with the hearings before the House Committee on Agriculture on the sugar bill Dr. Tugwell, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and the man who I understand represents that Department on the foreign policy committee of the administration, expressed his views as to tariff protection generally as follows:

Well, I am afraid that Mr. Weaver, who made that statement, is a better Democrat than most of us. I think he believes that no industry is entitled to support by tariff, and I may say personally that I agree with him.

It is only fair to Dr. Tugwell to state that he went on and stated that he did not favor the entire elimination of the domestic sugar industry by withdrawing tariff protection at this time. However, I am sure that he would not deny that the statement above quoted is a correct expression of his views on the subject of agricultural tariffs generally. Now, of course, if that is the view of the administration, as expressed by one who not only holds a high official position but who is credited with being the no. 1 man of the "brain trust" and the close advisor of the President on economic matters, it justly furnishes cause for alarm to all the producers of agricultural commodities. This is true because with the exception of cotton there is no important agricultural commodity which we produce which cannot be grown at a lower cost somewhere on the globe, and, consequently, in order to protect our own growers it is necessary to impose tariffs. In other words, to apply the test suggested by the proponents of the legislation, they are inefficient industries. Therefore, if Professor Tugwell's views are to prevail in the administration of this tariff measure we may look forward to the time when protection will be denied to any branch of agriculture in this country.

The attitude of the administration toward the protection of the American farmer was further revealed in the first draft of this legislation, the bill introduced on March 2. Section 2 of that bill, among other things, provides that the third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act.

Now just what does that mean? It means precisely this: That in the reciprocal treaties which are made by authority of this legislation preference shall be given to flour which is milled in bond in Buffalo from Canadian wheat over flour produced by American farmers on American farms. The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 attempts to protect the American farmer in this regard by providing that in the case of exports to countries with which we have reciprocal tariff arrangements the Buffalo miller must pay into the Treasury of the United States an amount equal to the preference given flour from this country by the nation to which flour is to be exported, in this way preventing the Buffalo miller of Canadian wheat from securing the advantage over the miller of American wheat. The original draft of this act, however, provided that this legislation should be disregarded in making agreements under this act. Could there be any more flagrant case of disregard of the American producer in favor of the foreign producer than this? To the credit of the Committee on Ways and Means, be it said that when this matter was called to their attention they attempted to rectify it, but in my judgment have only partly done so by adopting the amendment which was proposed by the State Department. As the bill now reads, it provides that the third paragraph of section 311 "shall not apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act with any country which does not grant exclusive preferential duties to the United States with respect to flour." I am told that, owing to our treaties, embodying the most-favored-nation provision, there is no country except Cuba which can give exclusive preferential duties to the United States. This means, therefore, that, except in Cuba, the Buffalo miller of Canadian wheat is going to be given a great advantage over the miller of American wheat and that the benefits of such reciprocal treaties as we may make with respect to wheat is going to go to the Canadian farmer rather than the American farmer, also affording a further illustration of the fact that there is no opportunity under the provisions of this legislation to expand the market for American wheat and flour.

I cannot overlook the further fact that this legislation was proposed shortly after the return of the Secretary of State from a trip to our sister republics in South America. Obviously, it is the thought of the administration that it may be possible through this legislation to make reciprocal treaties with the South American countries. If we do that, what is the nature of the trade so developed going to be? Obviously, it will mean that we shall have to permit the importation of raw materials, because these countries have no manufacturing industries. Likewise, we will exchange for those raw materials manufactured articles, because those are the products which South American countries need and desire. If that is the case and it appears to me that it is very obvious that it will be the case, it means that the American farmer is going to be faced with the competition of Argentine beef, flax, hides, wool, and wheat; with cattle, fresh fruits and vegetables, hides, and other products from Mexico, with sugar from Cuba and other countries to the south, and with many varieties of fresh fruits and vegetables from Cuba and other Latin American countries. Canada furnishes a great market for industrial products; but if we are to extend our markets in that country, we must be prepared to take in exchange wheat, cattle, and dairy products to the detriment of our own producers.

Aside from agricultural products, if we build up a trade in manufactured articles with countries less developed than our own, we must be prepared to take in exchange nonagricultural raw materials such as petroleum, copper, and lumber. How is it going to help the petroleum industry in this country, centered in the great States of Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and California, to import petroleum from Venezuela, Mexico, and Colombia even if we are able to dispose of machinery and automobiles in exchange therefor? How are the States of Arizona and Montana to be benefited if we trade manufactured articles for copper from Chile and other countries, and of what avail is it going to be to the great lumber States of Washington and Oregon if in exchange for automobiles, typewriters, and farm machinery we are compelled to take lumber and its products from Russia and Canada?

How would it adversely affect the wheat growers of Kansas to lower the tariff and increase our imports of flax, sugar, and dairy products? Assuming that wheat producers do not grow the products mentioned, it means that land now devoted to the production of flax, sugar beets, and dairy products will be brought into wheat production in competition with Kansas farmers.

Since, as I have already shown, it is nearly, if not entirely, impossible to increase our export markets are we to be entirely helpless in the matter? Is it true that we are going to have to put into effect compulsory crop control and have the Department of Agriculture in Washington tell our farmers what they can grow? What is the solution? Perhaps a hint of what it is can be taken from the fact that even in the depression year of 1933 we imported over $500,000,000 worth of agricultural products which could have been grown in this country. Under the plan of those who are advocating this legislation we would not only continue to bring in these substitutes for American products but would increase the amount on the faint chance that by doing so we might find additional markets for cotton, wheat, tobacco, and lard.

Is this a sensible or reasonable course to follow? Rather is not it better to forget for the time being the illusion of foreign markets which do not exist and arrange to protect the American farmer in what he can produce for consumption in this country.

There may be those who think there is danger in this bill for the industrial sections of the country, but to me it appears that there is a far greater danger to the agricultural sections and that the result in the end will be to sacrifice the interests of the Mississippi Valley for the industrial sections on both coasts, as has so often been done before.

Therefore, I feel that every Member of this House representing an agricultural constituency should think twice before putting into the hands of the President and his advisors the power to destroy absolutely some of the important branches of agriculture in this country.

Of course, it is going to be said, as has already been said many times in the course of this debate, that this power will not be used in such a fashion. I have no doubt but that those who have made such statements believe sincerely that this is the case. A year ago, however, many of you believed just as sincerely that if the President were given the power which he asked for in the economy bill it would be exercised with justice and mercy. The question as to whether or not it has been so exercised is best answered by the fact that on yesterday 210 members of the President's own party voted to pass over his veto a bill which, in a large degree, takes away the power and discretion conferred in the Economy Act.

To say that the powers granted in the pending bill will not be exercised fairly or justly is not necessarily a criticism of the President, in whose integrity and good intentions all of us have the greatest confidence. It does mean, however, that those upon whom the President must necessarily depend to exercise these powers may fail as signally to do justice as has been the case in the administration of the Economy Act.

With the lesson of the Economy Act before us, it seems to me that all of us who in good faith want to protect the interests of our own districts, should hesitate a long time before conferring upon any individual the tremendous powers contained in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the few remarks one can make in 8 minutes on such an important measure are made because of loyalty to the section from which one comes.

I have read practically all the hearings held by the Ways and Means Committee. We have listened to the somersaulting opinions that have been put in the Record until our heads swim, and whom of your present and former Democratic leaders can you now follow? Even the President of the United States himself, referring to a campaign speech of 1932, has had a complete somersault of opinion; and only on Monday we saw a most complete somersault of opinion on the part of the very able gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. The only way he could extricate himself was through a very eloquent and tearful appeal that we must not rock the boat; that we must support the administration; yet that tearful appeal on Monday did not seem to have any effect on giving support to the President's veto on yesterday.

It has been mentioned that possibly fine textiles and toys may be classed as inefficient industries. Well, that should be sufficient to claim my opposition, coming from the district which I represent. Sugar is often mentioned, and I think that will be enough for those who come from the districts where beet sugar is manufactured. They have dared to mention only a very few articles, so that those must have been the outstanding ones in mind marked for destruction for trading purposes. Throughout this long debate and during the lengthy hearings great care has been taken to avoid naming the industries that are to be subjected to these contemplated horse trades.

It is evident that it would not do to mention any particular industry. I am pleading this afternoon that you do not jeopardize our industries in New England, which are so highly diversified. Many of these industries may be considered inefficient from the standpoint that they do need tariff protection. They cannot compete with foreign nations without this tariff protection and preserve our American standard of living conditions. Business is in a most precarious condition. I have been hoping that the patient might be allowed to get in a little healthier condition before we performed any more of these major operations. Industries in general may now well be terror-stricken lest they be traded away without notice, and the banks may well be most careful about getting further involved in extending credit to what may be finally adjudged a good trading possibility. There will be some consternation caused by the passage of this measure, and at a time, above all other times, when such an effect should be avoided.

May I remind the House this afternoon that recently we were often told that conditions are getting better. We do believe that world conditions are getting better, and we also know that the banks are in a stronger liquid position. However, may I at this time refer to the word "thermometer"? We can imagine some people with their fur coats this winter coming indoors and saying, "Why, the weather is not very cold outside." "I believe the thermometer must be going up many degrees." "I am not suffering from the cold." Then someone else comes in who has no outside coat. He is probably shivering. He says, "I think the thermometer is going down, and it seems to me very cold indeed."

Thus they put into the RECORD spots in the country that seem to be on the upturn, but we do not put in the RECORD those spots where business is not on the upturn. We do not go down to the R.F.C. and look over thousands of applications of industries that are trying to save themselves from annihilation or to get on their feet. Have we a reasonably good thermometer to tell us the real state of affairs? We have. Only day before yesterday it was stated that the Federal Reserve banks had to issue more Federal Reserve notes against United States securities; that commercial paper was at the lowest ebb at any time since the war. You cannot deny the truth in the reading of this thermometer. Two weeks ago the Federal Reserve reported that the member banks owed less than they did a year ago. There is another reliable thermometer of business conditions. The administration seems to have almost complete dominance of the radio and even of the press. But the whole truth should be presented. Sections of the country where conditions have improved may well be commented upon, but the public also should know where conditions still prevail of opposite character.

Mr. Chairman, before this major operation is really performed, I appeal for consideration for the diversified industries in my section of the country. Why put more fear in them that their very existence may be jeopardized? Certainly creditors will not allow more credit to those that are in the least suspected of being marked for annihilation or even reduction. There are but few Members here paying attention to the arguments. I rather think, however, that the Members are reading these speeches rather carefully. I think they are weighing these arguments, especially of the leaders who have somersaulted. How can these same people who opposed these suggestions so strongly a year or more ago now turn around and take such a different attitude? Is there not a principle here involved? Is it so clearly a matter of pure politics? I am hopeful that we may be throwing off the yoke that has been around our necks. During the whole of the year 1932 I had to listen to the continued and most biting sarcasm and criticism of our Republican President. Until very recently criticism has seemed to be unpatriotic if applied to this administration. If the minority suggest or attempt to criticize, you whine and call it unpatriotic criticism. Now you have set the example yourselves. You have recently not only said things, but you did it yesterday. When the time comes that a great majority like yours will not support an administration veto it is time to release the gentlemen on this side of the aisle who are supposed to criticize and really fulfill its mission as a minority party without the charge of unpatriotism being hurled.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I was placed in an unenviable position this year as ranking member of the minority and was supposed to investigate these great, so-called "relief expenditures." Whether my activity had anything to do with the matter or not, great changes in the manner of relief expenditures have been made by the administration itself. They have embarked upon an absolutely new scheme of relief which, as far as I can understand the plans at present, I rather approve. There is a new method, another somersault, but in the right direction.

Mr. Chairman, I stand here pleading for my New England. We have not the fertile fields of the South and West. When you visit me you say, "How can these people earn a living?" They have been frugal all these years. That bare country up there in New England has been financing the rest of the country. Although fields are not fertile, we have built ourselves up gradually until today we have a large number of important industries. Why threaten our existence? We do need a tariff. Of course, we are inefficient if that is to be the measure, as we cannot get along without a tariff to protect us from cheap labor abroad.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas said the other day "Do not rock the boat. Stick to the boat." His statement appealed to me very strongly, because he is a warm personal friend of mine, but when he came face to face with his own language of a year or two ago he lost his head and became simply rhetorical. He suggests that we keep on making experiments. He might have told us that not a single experiment has as yet succeeded. All these schemes of the new deal are yet in the experimental stage. Even the N.R.A. is sagging, but we are hopeful. He tells us to be patriotic because if the boat goes down we are all going down together. Because of this fear he seems ready to sacrifice his principles, so often and so forcefully expressed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein section 336, of the Tariff Act of 1930.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COLDEN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, on March 2, 1934, President Franklin D. Roosevelt sent to Congress a message asking that he be given the authority to levy taxes, and to conclude treaties, "trade treaties" he termed them, without ratification by the Senate, or approval by the Congress.

On the same day the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, introduced the administration's bill which would grant the authority requested.

On March 5 notice was given that the Committee on Ways and Means would commence hearings on the bill on March 8, and on the latter date the chairman of the committee announced his intention to close the hearings on March 12. This speed was in compliance with the President's "hope for early action", but permitted no adequate consideration for a measure of such vital importance to American agriculture, industry, and labor. On the latter date insistent and repeated requests became necessary to secure a hearing for two opponents of the bill—James A. Emery on March 13 and Samuel Crowther on March 15. The bill was reported to the House on March 17 and consideration there was commenced on March 23 and probably will be completed with its passage on March 29. There will then have passed the House in 6 days a bill upon which hearings were held for a like time, and which gives to one man the power to destroy every agricultural and industrial enterprise dependent upon a protective tariff for its existence.

It is at once apparent that the speed with which this measure was rushed through the committee prevented that careful, studied, and deliberate consideration which should have been given a matter of such far-reaching effect. Since the recent destruction of our Air Mail Service by Executive order, a letter mailed from Washington to Pacific coast points cannot receive an answer in 6 days. The result is that the views of agriculture, industry, and labor could not be and were not fully and fairly presented to the committee and are not now known to the membership of the House. Few, it seems, desire to have these views, but are supinely content to vote "yes" for any grant of power requested by the President, without consideration of its constitutionality or long-established governmental policy. Germany, a few years ago, had 22 political parties, but now, under the dictatorship of Hitler, has one: and her present Reichstag is known as the "Ya Reichstag". If the Seventy-third Congress does not soon commence to function by doing its own legislative thinking and voting, my fear is that it will go down in history as the "Yes Congress".

It should be unnecessary to state that my opposition to this bill is not based upon any doubt of the integrity and high purpose of the man at present in the White House.

Under our Constitution and the traditions of our people I could not justify the grant of such power to any man. It is not a question of politics or individuals.

The results of the honest but injudicious exercise of such power would be disastrous to large sections of our country, agricultural and industrial, and would impoverish large blocks of our workers. For instance, if the cotton interests of the country should gain the confidence of the Chief Executive and persuade him to conclude a trade agreement with Russia whereby the tariff upon wheat would be reduced 50 percent in consideration of more favorable trade conditions for American cotton in the Russian markets, the result in our wheat-growing States would be the despair and armed defiance of judicial process which obtained a year ago; and the result in our cotton-growing States would be no enlarged market for cotton in Russia, for no trade agreement with its government could compel its industries or people to buy our cotton. They would buy in the cheaper markets of India, Egypt, or the Sudan.

The results of the dishonest and corrupt exercise of such power, or the promise of it, might determine presidential and congressional elections, or might even plunge the country into a revolution by destroying large industrial enterprises and stagnating large agricultural areas.

These are not fanciful illustrations. Under the bill the President in negotiating a trade agreement acts without the aid, counsel, or advice of any governmental agency, fact-finding body, or commission. The agreement once made becomes effective without submission to or approval by the Congress or either branch thereof; and its Members are the chosen representatives of the people to be affected thereby. The answer is made that the President will seek competent advice from existing governmental agencies and will be guided by the highest motives in administering the law. However, the road to destruction is paved with good intentions.

Inasmuch as his Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, appeared before the committee and advocated the passage of the bill, he would undoubtedly be consulted if a trade agreement covering wheat were considered. Secretary Wallace advised the committee that American inefficient products should be made the subject of foreign trade agreements, and his test of efficiency is: Can the article be produced cheaper in the foreign country? This test would make many of our industrial and most of our agricultural products the subjects of trade agreements, and wheat would be one of them.

The Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, as an argument for the passage of the bill, cited statistics showing the decline in our export trade during the years 1925 to 1933, inclusive. He argued that foreign countries could not buy from us because they could not sell to us, and that they could not sell to us because of our high tariffs. This argument falls when we consider the fact that exports of dutiable and nondutiable articles fell in the same proportion during the years named and when we consider the further fact that America had high tariff duties when our export trade was the largest.

This depression has been world-wide and exempted no country from its constricting effects. The commerce of all nations was greatly reduced, but has now begun to expand in Europe and both Americas. The statistics cited by Mr. DOUGHTON show that the low point in our export trade was reached in 1932, and that there was a gain of more than 4 per cent in 1933. More impressive is the gain in January of 1934 over January of 1933, where our export trade increased more than 42 per cent. It will be many years before it reaches its former high total, measured either in volume or in terms of dollars. Few of us sense the new economy. No longer are the nations of the earth divided into manufacturing nations and raw-material nations, but each seeks to become self-contained and self-sustained, and many have almost succeeded. The World War hastened the movement. Prior thereto the United States relied upon Chili for nitrates and upon Germany for potash and many chemicals and dyes. When these sources were shut off by the war our chemists supplied our needs, and a great step toward complete self-containment was taken.

I do not minimize the importance of expanding our export trade if same can be done without damage to our home markets, but I am firmly convinced that such expansion can be accomplished best under our present system of tariff laws, with appropriate changes in the rates of duty where costs of production have changed. These changes, in most instances, can be made under its flexible provisions.

The American market belongs to the American people and should be preserved for them. On it is sold more than 90 per cent of all we produce, and on it is done more than one half of the business of the entire world. It is because of these facts that the nations of the world seek to enter it, and no one should be permitted to barter or trade away any portion of it. It should be guarded from foreign invasion as carefully as our territorial limits.

The theory of protection for American industry, agriculture, and labor, although always advocated by the Republican Party and opposed by the Democratic, did not originate with the former. It was in the minds of those who framed the Constitution. The second act passed by the First Congress of the United States, July 4, 1789 (ch. 2, 1 Stat. 24), contained the following recital:

SECTION 1. Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported:

Be it enacted, etc.

In this Congress sat many members of the Constitutional Convention of 1787.

From that day until this day the attempt has been made to prevent destructive foreign competition where the foreign article can be delivered in the principal markets of the United States at a price less than the cost of production of like articles here. The difference in such costs is added to that of the foreign article, and thus foreign and domestic products enter American markets upon a price equality.

If this price equality is maintained—and it can be maintained in most instances by the flexible provisions of the present tariff law—foreign trade will be encouraged, our exports will expand, and every benefit promised by the proponents of the bill will be secured.

The theory and practice of protection of industry and agriculture has so prospered the United States that all European countries and nearly all other countries of the world have adopted it. Prior to 1840 England had the most drastic protection laws enacted at any time by any nation. It was a penal offense to import a yard of cloth. Flemish weavers were brought to England to teach the English people the art of weaving and her varied industries were expanded to the highest volume of production. It became necessary to seek outside markets and England passed the corn laws about 1840, sacrificed agriculture to industry, and became a free-trade country. This policy was followed many years with increasing disaster until her statesmen, heeding past history and the experience of the United States, gradually returned to the protective policy. From 1927 to 1932 Lords Beaverbrook and Northcliffe, with their powerful newspapers, sponsored a campaign to "Buy British" and to preserve the British markets for the British people. This campaign resulted in the Imperial Economic Conference held in Ottawa, Canada, in 1932, whereat, on August 20, 1932, pacts, known as the "Ottawa Pacts", were executed between and among the United Kingdom and the British Commonwealths, preserving the British markets to the British peoples by a system of high protective tariffs. I was in Canada for a time while the conference was in session, and anxiety was expressed that above policy might be offensive to the people of the United States. I replied that no offense could be taken for we recognized the right of the British Parliaments to legislate for the benefit of the British people, just as the United States Congress exercised the right to legislate for the benefit of the people of the United States.

The wisdom of the Ottawa Pacts has already been demonstrated by the revival in business throughout Great Britain and the British Commonwealths. With that recent experience before us, shall we pass this bill and grant the President of the United States the authority to barter away our markets? It should be borne in mind that the bill provides no policy or plan by which the President shall be guided in negotiating trade agreements; his discretion, that of one man, will be unlimited. He is not compelled or even advised to consult the Tariff Commission with its trained personnel of 273 at home and abroad, many of them experts with years of experience. If he continues the practice he has followed since entering the White House, he will depend almost entirely upon the "brain trust" for advice and guidance. I do not entertain the common prejudice against this group of professors, but my criticism of these advisers is that they are a group of theorists and to it should be added men of outstanding achievements in the fields of industry, agriculture, and commerce. This group is responsible to no one save the President, and he must bear the odium of their errors, and they have been many.

During the course of the hearings before the committee, with other members of the minority, I attempted to secure from representatives of the administration an example of a trade agreement such as they contemplated to conclude if this bill became law. Answers were refused on the grounds that future negotiations might be jeopardized. However, the real reason was the fear that the passage of the bill would be jeopardized if the Members of this House knew what industries and products of their districts were to be sacrificed in trade agreements.

For purposes of comparison with the bill before us, I will at this point in my remarks insert the flexible provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930. They are as follows:

SEC. 336. EQUALIZATION OF COSTS OF PRODUCTION

(a) Change of classification or duties: In order to put into force and effect the policy of Congress by this act intended, the Commission (1) upon request of the President, or (2) upon resolution of either or both Houses of Congress, or (3) upon its own motion, or (4) when in the judgment of the Commission there is good and sufficient reason therefor, upon application of any interested party, shall investigate the differences in the costs of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article. In the course of the investigation the Commission shall hold hearings and give reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings. The Commission is authorized to adopt such reasonable procedure and rules and regulations as it deems necessary to execute its functions under this section. The Commission shall report to the President the results of the investigation and its findings with respect to such differences in costs of production. If the Commission finds it shown by the investigation that the duties expressly fixed by statute do not equalize the differences in the costs of production of the domestic article and the like or similar foreign article when produced in the principal competing country, the Commission shall specify in its report such increases or decreases in rates of duty expressly fixed by statute (including any necessary change in classification) as it finds shown by the investigation to be necessary to equalize such differences. In no case shall the total increase or decrease of such rates of duty exceed 50 percent of the rates expressly fixed by statute.

(b) Change to American selling price: If the Commission finds upon any such investigation that such differences cannot be equalized by proceedings as hereinbefore provided, it shall so state in its report to the President and shall specify therein such ad valorem rates of duty based upon the American selling price (as defined in sec. 402 (g)) of the domestic article, as it finds shown by the investigation to be necessary to equalize such differences. In no case shall the total decrease of such rates of duty exceed 50 percent of the rates expressly fixed by statute, and no such rate shall be increased.

(c) Proclamation by the President: The President shall by proclamation approve the rates of duty and changes in classification and in basis of value specified in any report of the Commission under this section if, in his judgment, such rates of duty and changes are shown by such investigation of the Commission to be necessary to equalize such differences in costs of production.

(d) Effective date of rates and changes: Commencing 30 days after the date of any Presidential proclamation of approval the increased or decreased rates of duty and changes in classification or in basis of value specified in the report of the Commission shall take effect.

(e) Ascertainment of differences in costs of production: In ascertaining under this section the differences in costs of production, the Commission shall take into consideration, insofar as it finds it practicable:

(1) In the case of a domestic article: (A) The cost of production as hereinafter in this section defined; (B) transportation costs and other costs incident to delivery to the principal market or markets of the United States for the article; and (C) other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition.

(2) In the case of a foreign article: (A) The cost of production as hereinafter in this section defined, or, if the Commission finds that such cost is not readily ascertainable, the Commission may accept as evidence thereof, or as supplemental thereto, the weighted average of the invoice prices or values for a representative period and/or the average wholesale selling price for a representative period (which price shall be that at which the article is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in the principal market or markets of the principal competing country or countries in the ordinary course of trade and in the usual wholesale quantities in such market or markets); (B) transportation costs and other costs incident to delivery to the principal market or markets of the United States for the article; (C) other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition, including advantages granted to the foreign producers by a government, person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country.

(f) Modification of changes in duty: Any increased or decreased rate of duty or change in classification or in basis of value which has taken effect as above provided may be modified or terminated in the same manner and subject to the same conditions and limitations (including time of taking effect) as is provided in this section in the case of original increases, decreases, or changes.

(g) Prohibition against transfers from the free list to the dutiable list or from the dutiable list to the free list: Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize a transfer of an article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list, nor a change in form of duty. Whenever it is provided in any paragraph of title I of this act, or in any amendatory act, that the duty or duties shall not exceed a specified ad valorem rate upon the articles provided for in such paragraph, no rate determined under the provisions of this section upon such articles shall exceed the maximum ad valorem rate so specified.

(h) Definitions: For the purpose of this section—

(1) The term "domestic article" means an article wholly or in part the growth or product of the United States; and the term "foreign article" means an article wholly or in part the growth or product of a foreign country.

(2) The term "United States" includes the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia.

(3) The term "foreign country" means any empire, country, dominion, colony, or protectorate, or any subdivision or subdivisions thereof (other than the United States and its possessions).

(4) The term "cost of production", when applied with respect to either a domestic article or a foreign article, includes, for a period which is representative of conditions in production of the article: (A) The price or cost of materials, labor costs, and other direct charges incurred in the production of the article and in the processes or methods employed in its production; (B) the usual general expenses, including charges for depreciation or depletion which are representative of the equipment and property employed in the production of the article and charges for rent or interest which are representative of the cost of obtaining capital or instruments of production; and (C) the cost of containers and coverings of whatever nature, and other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing the article in condition packed ready for delivery.

(i) Rules and regulations of President: The President is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for carrying out his functions under the provisions of this section.

(j) Rules and regulations of Secretary of Treasury: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the entry and declaration of foreign particles of the class or kind of articles with respect to which a change in basis of value has been made under the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section, and for the form of invoice required at time of entry.

(k) Investigations prior to enactment of act: All uncompleted investigations instituted prior to the approval of this act under the provisions of section 315 of the Tariff Act of 1922, including investigations in which the President has not proclaimed changes in classification or in basis of value or increases or decreases in rates of duty, shall be dismissed without prejudice; but the information and evidence secured by the Commission in any such investigation may be given due consideration in any investigation instituted under the provisions of this section.

A judicious execution of the section of the present tariff law just quoted will secure all the benefits promised by the most ardent supporters of the bill under consideration. As indicated by its caption, its purpose is "equalization of costs of production." That is, foreign nations can offer their goods in our markets at the cost of production of like goods in the United States. The very purpose and intent of this bill is to permit foreign nations to offer their goods in our markets at prices below the cost of production of like goods in the United States. In making this statement I am mindful of the fact that the bill would permit the raising of tariffs, but an increase of tariffs would never be a consideration that would move a foreign nation to execute a trade agreement.

It should be borne in mind that a decrease in a tariff rate in favor of a foreign nation entering into a trade agreement with the United States would be effective in favor of all nations, though not signatory to the agreement. For example, in the illustration used at the beginning of my remarks, if we made a trade agreement with Russia whereby the tariff upon wheat would be reduced 50 per cent, the reduced rate would be effective world-wide, and Canada, Argentina, and other wheat-producing countries would enjoy the full benefits of the agreement without making trade concessions to the United States.

The flexible provisions of the present tariff law correct inequalities of tariff rates that may arise between sessions of Congress and between periods when general revisions become necessary. Provision is made for initiation of investigations before the Tariff Commission to determine whether inequalities exist. But, most important of all, the industry to be affected by a change in rate is given the right to be heard. The fact and the extent of any inequality alleged to exist is determined by a quasi-judicial body, the creature of Congress. The purpose of the pending bill is not the execution of trade agreements upon equality of costs of production at home and abroad but upon inequality, with the difference in favor of the foreign producer.

These agreements would be executed in secret, without notice to the industry to be affected or the right to be heard. The industries so treated would literally be lynched. The enactment of this bill in its present form would be a continuing threat against agriculture and industry—a sword of Damocles that would stagnate both.

The best illustration of the effect upon industry and the American people of action in secret by the Chief Executive is afforded by his recent cancelation of the air-mail contracts without affording the companies affected thereby a chance to present their case. In this action, conceived in secret, there was another interest ignored—that of the public. Without warning 115 cities were deprived of air-mail service, 36 cities were deprived either totally or partially of passenger and express service by airplane, 650 pilots, copilots, and other persons were deprived of employment, and 82,400 American citizens, stockholders in the various companies affected by the order, lost large sums of money in the instant decline in the value of their holdings. This was followed by the ghastly and needless sacrifice of the lives of 11 Army pilots, who, under military orders and without adequate training, attempted to transport the mails in planes unsuited for the use and unsupplied with the instruments necessary for safe flying.

The President made a tragic mistake, and the excuse is offered that he was poorly advised. That is true, but it was a decision reached in secret conferences with persons who did not share the responsibility. All these catastrophes resulted because it was alleged that certain officers of certain companies had been guilty of wrongdoing in securing the air-mail contracts. No opportunity to be heard was given; no resort to the courts of the land was had. The contracts were simply canceled, and the right to make such cancelation left for judicial determination hereafter, with the almost certainty that the Government will be compelled to respond in damages for the wrongful cancelation. So confident were the officers of one company that they were innocent of wrongdoing that they offered to carry the mail for 30 days, to be compensated therefor only in the event that their contract was found untainted with fraud. The offer was refused. It is not conceivable that the order of cancelation would have been issued had the interested parties been afforded a prior opportunity for a hearing, and had the President sought the advice of Lindbergh and Rickenbacker and other outstanding pilots conversant with the problems and dangers of flying the mails.

The provisions of the bill are unconstitutional for the reasons so ably advanced by our colleague, Mr. BECK, and others. Its passage would seriously retard recovery. The exercise of the powers to be conferred therein would destroy many branches of industry, demoralize large agricultural areas, and result in widespread unemployment. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, one of these days we will wake up to learn once more that the great majority of the people of these United States still believe in a representative form of government and the discharge by the several branches thereof of the duties and obligations constitutionally inherent therein. It is still true, and a great majority of Americans are so convinced, that democracy, representative government, free speech, and a free press, in spite of their faults, are best suited to the needs and demands we Americans make of the Government upon which we depend and under which we live. Someone has said that countries not so long accustomed to free representative government may not find despotism objectionable, but in America I believe that we have been working along better lines, more suited to our own habits of thought and more likely to lead to a permanent solution of the problems of this age.

True it is that government of the people, by the people, and for the people has steadily perished on European soil. We may well ask the question: Where next is autocracy to triumph in a world supposedly made safe for democracy 15 fantastic years ago?

I am in favor of reciprocal tariff agreements negotiated by those authorized and empowered to make such agreements under the law.

I am in favor of the reasonable extension of our foreign commerce under such trade treaties if the same can be so effected.

I believe in the theory of reciprocal trade agreements effectuated under constitutional authority and within the law of this land.

I am in favor of many things for which this measure attempts to provide the method of accomplishment, but I am unalterably opposed to the bill itself because I believe it is unconstitutional, and the policy for which it stands, so far as the means of attaining the end sought thereby, is un-American and wrong; it follows that compromise is impossible.

There are such unusual policies and problems of government involved in this measure so vitally affecting the welfare of the people of the United States and millions of citizens yet unborn as to relegate to the background and to make of trivial importance, comparatively speaking, all questions of temporary expediency, of tariff treaties, reciprocal trade agreements involving the extension of our commerce or our international relations.

The founders of this Republic undertook to establish a government in which the will of the people should be supreme. Every end they sought to attain or had in mind was motivated by a desire to found a democracy free, on the one hand, from the perils of autocracy and dictatorship, with which they were altogether too familiar, and, on the other, to protect themselves against anarchy and a disorderly government, in order to secure the blessings of liberty for themselves and their posterity.

Over and over again they wrote into their fundamental laws and declarations the challenging statement that frequent recurrence to fundamental principles, a strict adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, industry, and frugality are absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and keep government free. The checks and balances they made a part of the governmental structure they erected, if observed and followed, will continue to guarantee the perpetuity of the nation they created, and will preserve the safety of the countless millions who now and in the days to come shall seek and be entitled to the protection it affords.

I am not an alarmist, but I am concerned that the permanency of our national life and its integrity is involved in the governmental policy we are asked to countenance and approve. I am sure that the preservation of our liberties and the perpetuity of our form of government is the tremendous stake at issue and which must be met. The question confronting us is too momentous and serious to be the football of partisan politics. It transcends all questions of tariff or trade agreements. This bill strikes at the very root of all our American institutions. It is another step toward a change in our form of government. This is the issue involved.

It is axiomatic that the Constitution does not give the President the right or the authority to legislate; that is not a function of the executive branch. Congress cannot delegate such power or authority to the President or anyone else. The Constitution specifically forbids it. I have not been able to find any, and it has been incontrovertibly stated that "there is no decision of any court anywhere by virtue of which it has been held that Congress has any right to delegate its power of legislation." It is equally true that there is no decision of any court anywhere upholding the constitutionality of any act undertaking to give the President the power to tax. "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes," says the Federal Constitution; and who shall say that is not the fundamental law which he who runs may read? It is not susceptible of distortion or contravention.

The functions, duties, and responsibilities of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of our Government are clearly defined by the supreme law of the land, limited and construed by the numerous decisions of our highest judicial tribunals.

It may be futile, as has been suggested, to oppose the enactment of this radical legislation which contemplates the transfer of the taxing power from the legislative to the executive branch, an abdication of rights and powers absolutely in derogation of, and contrary to law—not a delegation of administrative authority involving the use of a discretion thereunder according to the law, but a delegation of authority, prerogatives, and certain duties resting in and inherent alone in the Congress, nondelegable by virtue of the very nature thereof. Such a delegation in effect makes the Executive not only the executive but the legislative and judicial branch—a 3-in-1 arrangement, which ipso facto undertakes to deprive the legislative and judicial branches of the very power and authority and prerogatives which by and under the Constitution cannot be so delegated.

Opposition to such proposed legislation, and the suggestion with respect to its un-American and unconstitutional characteristics may avail nothing, but I would be remiss in the discharge of my obligations as a representative of the people of Vermont and derelict in my duty as a citizen, did I not most strenuously resist and oppose the measure we are now considering.

This measure should not be permitted to become a law. It is subversive of the very principles of government on which this Nation was established and must retain as basic, if it is to survive the fate of others that have followed the path of experimentation, dictatorship, and final political oblivion. The great disillusionment is due to arrive. The unwise and increasingly daring, un-American, and dangerous policies which the advisers of the President are attempting to force him to adopt and recommend and which have heretofore been foisted on the American people must be stopped. America must choose!

The gravest peril that confronts the Republic today is the apathy and indifference of its citizens and the semi-paralyzed condition of the body politic. In a democracy such a disease is insidious and deadly. Such legislation as this can only serve to broaden the area of devastation and to furnish more food on which the germ of communism and other "isms" may thrive and grow strong and eventually consummate the complete disintegration of the body politic.

This is America—God save the mark—and the liberties of her people must be preserved and conserved, their freedom guaranteed, and the initiative of the individual, which has made her great, must be encouraged. Autocratic, dictatorial enforcement of cooperation or regimentation of labor or control of production under threat of fine or imprisonment has no place in our American scheme and system of government. No more has the measure we are considering, which is but another step toward dictatorship.

It has been well said that—

It is not the gravity of the crisis as it affects the Constitution which alone should give us concern. The spirit of individualism is almost extinct; the average artisan today looks not to his good right arm but to the great and incomprehensible machine for salvation—he feels the Government is something to live on and not to live under.

The foundations are fast sinking, and, if the present process of destruction proceeds, it is not unlikely that within the life of the present generation the whole structure will fall into careless ruin.

It is time to stop and look and listen. America has solved many problems, but, as she meets and eventually defeats such issues as this, so shall she stand or fall. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that some of my good friends, including my California associates on the minority side, have forgotten that a great proportion of the agricultural industry of the United States is built on an export basis, and that if this export agriculture is to continue to be strangled, not so much by our own tariff that we have today as by the tariffs and quotas that have been imposed by foreign countries, that all of this domestic agricultural production is going to be thrown back upon the home market to the ruin of their competitors in similar lines throughout the Union. I refer, particularly, Mr. Chairman, to the fruit industry of the United States, and I want to assure you, on both sides of the House, that when the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS] and the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE] read into the RECORD a while ago certain telegrams and dispatches, they were in no wise representative of what is California's most important agricultural industry.

To many of you it will probably come as a strange announcement that California is largely an exporting State. But it is. In the year 1930, which is the last year for which we can have any figures that may be called normal, its exports, in value, were exceeded only by the States of New York and Texas. These exports, very largely, consist of the fresh and processed fruits grown there, as well as other agricultural products.

In this connection I desire to read to you a telegram received from the Dried Fruit Association of California:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., March 19, 1934.

HON. FRANK BUCK,

House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Pending legislation intended confer tariff powers upon President for purpose development reciprocal arrangements with foreign countries to benefit American agricultural exports believe of tremendous value to California dried-fruit industry, which is basic to fruit production this State. This association, with membership handling more than 95 percent of total dried-fruit production, earnestly requests your support of this legislation or any measure giving President necessary powers for reciprocal negotiations. Normally this industry dependent upon foreign trade for approximately 50 percent; total tonnage sold last year was reduced to 30 percent account various foreign restrictions, mainly tariff. Since dried-fruit outlet absorbs nearly 2,000,000 tons fresh fruit, successful exportation dried fruit vital to entire fresh-fruit industry.

Sincerely,

DWIGHT K. GRADY,

Vice President Dried Fruit Association of California.

What is true of the dried-fruit industry is equally true of the canning industry, not only of California but of the entire Pacific coast. The development of our orchards has been made on the basis of foreign exports of the products thereof. If the huge tonnage now available cannot be exported under favorable reciprocal agreements, it must either be sold in the United States or the orchards must be wiped out of existence and the farmers on them thrown into other channels of occupation. If we accept the figures of Mr. Grady as correct—and as a producer of fruit I can say that they err, if at all, on the conservative side—sale of this additional quantity in the United States will mean an increase of domestic consumption of California fruit products of 100 percent. This enormous quantity will be thrown on the market in competition with the apples and pears of New England and the Northern States and in competition with every other food product in the United States. It is with no false ideas of theory, therefore, but with a practical realization of the facts that confront us, that I have presented this telegram to you with my endorsement of the position which the author of it takes.

This position is endorsed by others. I had hoped that the minority Members who represent the great city of San Francisco would present for your consideration the position of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, whose members certainly no one can accuse of being partisan or interested in the destruction of industry. In view of the fact that they have not seen fit to do so, as one who is vitally interested in the welfare of San Francisco, I beg leave to present the position of the chamber, set out as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D.C., March 16, 1934.

HON. FRANK H. BUCK,

House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. BUCK: The board of directors of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce yesterday endorsed the reciprocal tariff bill and so notified me by telegraph this morning. This is H.R. 8687, and the chamber hopes you can see your way clear to support it.

Mr. J. W. Mailliard, Jr., president of the chamber, states in his dispatch:

"Experts are convinced that reciprocal tariff arrangements—that is, concessions for concessions in the matter of tariff rates—is the only way that the present log jam in the flow of international trade can be broken. I am convinced that the President will seek advice from experts and that he will use these powers in a manner which will do no harm to our domestic production, but will find commodities, the import of which may be increased without detriment to our domestic economy."

Sincerely yours,

C. B. DODDS,
Washington Representative.

The directors of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce are well aware of the great agricultural community that they have behind them and of the great opportunities that will accrue through its continued prosperity. They are aware that their own port facilities need and are awaiting the revival of the foreign trade that can only be accomplished through the passage of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that my time is limited. I shall only conclude by calling the attention of the committee again to the fact that not all industry, not all agriculture, can be limited to domestic markets and domestic consumption without upsetting them and in many cases ruining established forms of public enterprise that have been founded and developed to the profit of the individual American citizen on the basis of the natural flow of foreign commerce.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN].

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, it has been interesting to follow the extensive debate in the House on the present tariff proposal and listen to the jibes, quotations, and repartee of both the Democrats and the Republicans as to what each points out as a reversal of opinions on reciprocity and the inconsistencies of each other. As a boy on the farm, I well remember the eloquent appeals of James G. Blaine, the Republican nominee for President, for his program of the development of foreign trade, as well as the determined declarations of Grover Cleveland, the Democratic candidate, for a tariff for revenue only. While I was not a convert to his party, I was deeply impressed with the Plumed Knight's tariff policy, and have remained until this day in the belief that reciprocity is a sound policy for the development of foreign trade.

I remember, too, in my early days of the intriguing pamphlets of Henry George and his argument for a single tax levied upon real estate alone. I found his Protection or Free Trade, Which? more convincing to me against the fallacies of a high tariff than I did in favor of his theory of single tax. Free trade is an appealing theory, and its doctrines have had a profound influence upon the British Empire that for a long period maintained her position as the leading commercial nation of the globe. But free trade is not desirable from the standpoint of the citizenship of a country that enjoys the highest wages and the highest standard of living of any country in the world. Free trade is not desirable or practical unless wages and the standard of living are on a par with the nations engaging in such an understanding. It would be commercial and industrial suicide for this country to open wide its gates and permit the products of cheap foreign labor to flood our markets. So I have chosen a middle path that lies between the commercial isolation advocated by the high-tariff extremists on one side and the tariff for revenue only and free trade on the other.

Neither is it desirable for our Nation to adopt an extremely high tariff policy and follow it to the conclusion of national isolation. Such a course is possible, but it would result in unsound economy and would detract from our national prosperity and not inure to our individual welfare. This country is a great consumer of coffee, tea, sugar, silk, rubber, and other products that can be produced more cheaply abroad and can, by reciprocal treaties, open corresponding markets for our surplus products. It is a well-worn economic axiom, but its truth is generally accepted, that if we sell to other countries, we must buy; and if we buy from them, we must sell. Since the fruit, cotton, and wheat growers of our country produce a large surplus of these products, it follows that it is a sound policy to develop a market for these products. The same is true of many of our industries. The Orient particularly, as well as Latin-America, affords a splendid market for our automobiles and trucks, for our typewriters, motion pictures, and many other devices peculiar to American industry. While visiting Japanese cities, I was much interested in the information that the old-fashioned ricksha was being superseded by a modern rubber-tired one manufactured largely by a bicycle factory in New England.

To exchange our surplus fruit, wine, cotton, and wheat, oils and manufactured products for the coffee, tea, silk, sugar, rubber, and rope upon a reciprocal basis is fair trade profitable to both parties and of no injury to either. By this policy of reciprocity or fair trade we avoid the dangerous competition of free trade and low tariffs and we avoid the isolation and the unsound economy of extreme tariffs. Fair trade enables us to exchange our surplus products for those articles of commerce that we desire and does not require a drastic change in our economic set-up. The sudden raising or lowering of tariff rates is of such far-reaching effect that it is unsatisfactory to the manufacturer and the producer and may prove disastrous to the wage earner. But by reciprocal treaties these disastrous eruptions of commerce and industry produced by sudden tariff changes may be avoided.

Tariff legislation is necessarily difficult. Tariffs beneficial to one section may be disadvantageous to another. Each industry demands benefits for itself and battles to protect the special favors it is able to exact for its own enrichment. The shoe manufacturer desires a tariff on his finished product and is just as eager for free hides and reluctantly yields to the requests of the cattle industry for protection. Many other industries are in the same category. The wheat and cotton growers that sell their surpluses in the markets of the world clamor to buy in the world market.

In California we have vivid examples of the inconsistencies of the tariff system. Fish canners receive a niggardly tariff protection, while the fishermen are left with the forgotten men. The citrus growers have obtained generous protection but are unwilling to give the same consideration to the fish industry which produces fishmeal used for the fertilization of the citrus orchard. And so, from the first schedule to the last, a tariff revision up or down is a conflict of section against section, industry against industry, and those with the strongest political alliances, and perhaps have made the largest campaign contributions, usually win the war. Napoleon is recorded as saying that God was on the side of the heaviest artillery. In a tariff battle, destiny appears to favor those who have made the heaviest campaign contributions.

I cannot concur with my Republican colleagues that advocate higher tariffs and ultimate isolation as a panacea for all our ills. I feel some surprise and chagrin that some of the able Members of this House base their opinions upon such an unsound objective. High tariffs have too often been used as an instrument of special privilege and have been attained by loudly proclaiming generalities that appeal to the wage earner and the farmer, while the profits and benefits have been pocketed by the privileged few. It reminds me of a story of a shrewd friend in California who relates with gusto of the pool formed in California some years ago to buy grain sacks from the Orient and, by securing pledges from a successful Republican candidate for President, obtained a considerable tariff on said sacks and reaped a handsome fortune by their political ingenuity with no thought of developing a home industry. Such practices, I am informed, are not infrequent when tariff changes are contemplated.

California and the Pacific coast occupy a strategic location in regard to the trade of the Orient. The commerce of the Pacific and the industries of the Pacific Coast States have a splendid future with the encouragement of reciprocal treaties by the Government at Washington. With numerous rivers rushing from the mountains to the sea, an abundance of cheap electrical power is conducive to light manufacturing. With abundant supplies of timber, petroleum, copper, and other minerals, along with the products of the factory, the farm, the vineyard, and the orchard, the industrial and commercial development of the Pacific coast is but in its infancy.

Japan is now one of the important markets of America. China, too, is important but is now but a fraction of its possibilities as compared to the time when that unfortunate nation is able to establish a stable and a progressive government. China, in the near future, no doubt, will afford a great market for steel, timber, and equipment for her program of building railroads throughout the Republic. Her proposed highway system will demand materials and afford a great market for automobiles and supplies. Her cities and her modern homes, now developing, demand the comforts of electric lighting and modern appliances and will soon displace the kerosene lamp, which is to a considerable degree yet prevalent in China.

Siberia, the Russian door on the Pacific, affords another opportunity for American foreign trade in which the Pacific States will largely participate. Transportation costs from Pacific ports to Siberia are much less than from the heart of the Russian industrial sections which must use the more expensive railway transportation. The Philippines have already developed into an important customer which we trust will not be destroyed by the recent and ill-timed legislation. The Malay States are important consumers of California canned sardines. California fruits and milk products are finding a welcome in the markets of the Orient and these possibilities are beyond reckoning. Our products are sought in the East Indies as well as in the South Sea Islands, New Zealand, and Australia. The commerce of southern California is healthily increasing with Mexico, the nations of Central and South America.

Some Members from California feel a solicitude as to the effect reciprocity will have on the industries of southern California, particularly on the horticultural products, including the citrus products. This is a highly developed industry in southern California and its welfare has a marked influence upon our prosperity. The citrus industry represents a large investment and an intensive cultivation not equalled in the United States, and is a very important factor in our commerce, employment, and transportation. It has been the recipient of a reasonable tariff, but in return it has made available to the people of America the finest citrus products in the world.

Judging by the recent response of President Roosevelt to the appeals of the fishing industry in southern California, my section of California has an assurance that the President will use his powers under the proposed bill wisely and that his purpose is to build up markets and not destroy them. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to the bill, H.R. 7651, which I introduced on February 5, 1934, providing for the protection of the southern California fishing industry against the deadly competition of Japan. It is so patent that an American industry paying American wages cannot compete with the extremely low wages and the starvation standard of living of Japan that it seems needless to offer an argument. The American fisherman has no protection whatever against the frozen fish imported from that country.

Because of the heavy depreciation of the money in Japan the inadequate protective tariff designed to protect the tuna industry of California has been nullified to a great extent. At the present value of American money the yen shows a value of about 30 cents compared with its normal value of 50 cents. The average wages paid by the Japanese tuna industry is reputed to be but 33 cents for a day of from 12 to 15 hours compared with a daily wage of $3 per day in the California industry for a day of 8 hours. According to this schedule, the Japanese pay less than 3 cents per hour as against 37½ cents paid by the American industry, or more than 12 times as much. Therefore, a 30-percent tariff, based on Japanese cost of production, is wholly inadequate. The additional 15 percent added by the Tariff Commission and President Roosevelt is clearly insufficient. Comparing wages, 1,000 percent is more equitable. To open the gates of competition to the scale of wages as paid in Japan can have but one result—the complete ruin of the American industry.

From a political standpoint, California reactionary Representatives in Congress in years past have followed too blindly the tariff policies designed to profit the industries of New England and the eastern section of the country. California

Congressmen have helped prepare the tariff feast and have accepted the crumbs from the table. The late Smoot-Hawley tariff bill increased the tariff schedules designed to benefit other sections and, at the same time, omitted a tariff on petroleum. Thus the products of Mexico and South America were brought in direct competition with the product of the leading industry of California—oil—and practically drove California oil from the markets of the Atlantic seaboard. This was a terrific blow to a State which so many years supported a high-tariff policy for other sections of the country and received so little or no consideration for itself.

With all its inequalities, its discriminations, its unfairness, it would be inadvisable to undertake a revision of all tariff schedules at the present time. Depreciated currencies, the economic paralysis of the world, the tariff wars of nation against nation, the comprehensive recovery plan inaugurated in our own country, the new codes of hours and wages—all counsel against throwing down the bars and permitting a flood upon our already-stagnant markets. But there is one path of procedure that can be safely followed for the restoration of our foreign commerce. Let us declare for reciprocity and for fair trade, heeding the requirements of industry at home and promoting such commerce abroad that will permit us to export and to receive those articles of consumption that will bring comfort to ourselves and equivalent benefits to those with whom we trade. Let us avoid the restrictions of isolation of extreme high tariffs and let us beware of the pitfalls of free trade and ruinous competition and devote ourselves to a profitable course of fair trade.

We all deprecate the tariff wars of nation against nation which have shut us from many profitable markets and left our own surpluses to rot and rust upon our shores. We have seen nation retaliate against nation and too often we have seen these impassable bulwarks erected against the products of our own land. We have seen our leading industries build thousands of branches behind these retaliatory walls, depriving our own factories and our own workmen of employment that rightfully belonged to them. But we ourselves in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act were among the first to erect barriers against the nations of the world and thereby invited their disastrous retaliation. Let us undo our folly by the same policy of reciprocity and fair trade.

It is opportune now, since California and the Pacific Coast States have overthrown the reactionary political oligarchy of the past, to insist in sharing the benefits of a new deal in the structure of tariffs, and to deprive some of the benefits we have given and from which we have received such a meager portion for ourselves. Instead of mere followers in the dust of a discounted and discredited tariff system of isolation, let us embark upon a new policy designed to promote our trade and commerce with the Orient and Latin America, where the beacon of opportunity invites us; with the Orient, where half of the world dwells in need of food, clothing, and shelter. Where hungry mouths will consume our wheat. Where the needs of cotton have never been supplied. Where a thousand of our products will be readily welcomed. Not only the Orient but with the isles of the far southwest and Australia. And with Latin America, where new nations await with new opportunities and afford new markets. Instead of supporting tariffs that enrich others, let us of the Pacific coast look to ourselves and to the opportunities that are afforded by giving our united support to the President's program for reciprocal and fair trade, to a new deal in foreign trade, in which the States facing the Pacific may profitably participate. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPEL].

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am for this reciprocal tariff bill because it is an essential plank in our platform. As a Democrat I have faithfully followed the platform principles. For that reason I am going to vote for this bill.

I am pleased to see in the gallery the high type of representative American citizens in the young men students who are here, no doubt, to observe and gain experience as they later enter the contest of life. Practically all my votes as a Member of Congress have been in their interest—not in the interest of international bankers, who are so well represented on the Republican side.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPEL. In a moment. I have full confidence in the President that he will administer the act in the interest of the American people.

I notice that few Republican Members only are now on the floor. It is possible that those individuals who represent the super "brain trust" of America are on the Senate side of the Capitol, hoping and praying that the President's veto may be overridden.

I have found it to be a consistent feature of Republican Representatives to endeavor at all times to impede any measure which the Democrats bring on the floor.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the rule provides that the gentleman's remarks shall be confined to the bill. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the measure before the House.

Mr. KNUTSON. This is the first time the gentleman from California has not been with the Republicans.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. UMSTEAD). The point of order is sustained, and the gentleman will confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. HOEPEL. I should like to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts has voted consistently against—

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the measure before the House.

Mr. HOEPEL. I did not mention the gentleman's name.

Mr. TREADWAY. I know who the gentleman referred to, and I am going to continue to call him down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California must confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. HOEPEL. I am speaking in opposition to the Republican "brain trust." I call attention to the fact that in 1926 before we had a high tariff there was imported into America 74,000,000 pounds of lemons. We received $2.81 per box then for our local California lemons. After the high tariff was enacted in 1930 the price of our lemons decreased to $2.10 per box. We imported 30,000,000 of egg products in 1926 and received 31.1 cents per dozen for our California eggs. In 1932 we imported only 2,660,000 pounds and received only 17.2 cents per dozen for our eggs. Our importations were 1,300 percent less in 1932 than in 1926.

Mr. KNUTSON. How could it decrease 1,300 percent—

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPEL] has not yielded.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOEPEL. Perhaps I should have said our importation of egg products were 1,300 percent more in 1926 than in 1932.

In 1926 the United States imported 49,000,000 pounds of walnuts, while our walnut growers in California received $480 per ton for their walnuts. As soon as the Republicans put on a high protective tariff the price of walnuts dropped to $240 a ton, exactly one half, notwithstanding the fact that we imported only one quarter as much. I should like the Representatives on the Republican side to explain why with a high tariff the price of our products has decreased, notwithstanding the fact that importation has decreased. I should like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] answer that. I should like also to have the gentleman answer this. During the Hoover regime the deposits in our banks in 1928 were $58,000,000,000, and we had approximately 26,000 banks. At the end of the Hoover regime we had deposits of 45 billions of dollars in our banks and 7,050 banks had failed during his regime.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the bill before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. HOEPEL. I am proceeding in order.

Mr. TREADWAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He is not proceeding in order, and I appeal to the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that at that time the gentleman was in order. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. HOEPEL. Mr. Chairman, I make the observation that if I was talking here for the Wall Street interests, I would be in order.

Mr. TREADWAY. I again protest that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman was not in order.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman's remarks should be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. HOEPEL. They shall not be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. I make the point of order that they must be, if the gentleman is going to get so uppish about it.

Mr. HOEPEL. I call the Republican Members' attention to the fact that the price of our commodities in America is not determined by the tariff, but is determined by the amount of currency in circulation and credit expansion. What have you Republicans done? You have taken credit from the people and frozen their deposits in the myriad of failed banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes more to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPEL. I am afraid that I cannot explain sufficiently my disagreement with the Republicans of this House when they assail a meritorious practical measure such as we now have before us.

"Constitutional government", is all that I have heard from the Republican side. Every time we Democrats launch a constructive, progressive provision looking toward national recovery and put it into the stream of recovery, if it is worth while the Republicans take a pike hook and try to snag it. The gentleman who has been opposing me, with many of his Republican colleagues, voted for every measure in favor of the bankers during this session of Congress, and now he is attempting to prevent me from reciting true facts regarding Republican opposition to reciprocal tariff agreements.

Mr. TREADWAY. I again make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. FULLER. Oh, I think the gentleman is in order. Finances and the tariff are mixed together, plainly.

Mr. HOEPEL. Every time we bring something forward that is progressive, such as gold devaluation and this reciprocal tariff provision, the Republican Members, acting under the stimulus of some "superbrain trust", take out their pike hooks and endeavor to extract it from the recovery stream. They appear to be more concerned in playing politics than in bringing recovery to the American people.

When we advance something here which is progressive, something which is in the interest of the whole people and not in the interest of the banking fraternity of Wall Street, we find Republican reactionaries opposing our efforts. There are many liberal-minded Republicans in this House but, unfortunately, they are outbalanced by the reactionary, archaic group who believe or, at least, act as though the only reason this Government exists is to pay homage to entrenched wealth and special privilege. These reactionaries are out of step and sympathy with the best interests of the people, and they cannot rescue themselves by seeking to play politics with administration measures of recognized merit such as this and which are for the benefit of the whole American people—a universally recognized need in this period of our economic existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I was almost moved to tears when I sat here and listened to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] ask for sympathy and help for the infant industry in swaddling clothes. Lo and behold, we removed the swaddling clothes from the infant, and we found a full-grown man with long whiskers; and yet for him he sought further protection of a high tariff. [Laughter and applause.]

I am in favor of the passage of the bill now before us—the enactment of which will provide for an increase of foreign markets for the products of the United States. It will also increase the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency, and will help to maintain a better relationship among the various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce.

I favor the passage of this bill because I have faith and confidence in the sterling leadership of America's spokesman, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. My mind goes back to the ides of March 1933, when our Ship of State was wallowing in the throes of the worst economic storm that our country has ever known. The ship was sinking, the commander and crew were terror stricken, all hope had been abandoned and in fear and trepidation they awaited the end. In this dark hour the pilot boat hove in sight, and a new skipper and crew boarded the vessel. Almost immediately, under the guiding hands of the new commander and his crew, the Ship of State was successfully piloted to a safe anchorage.

Our countrymen who had been plunged into gloom and despair saw a new light shine on the horizon. Banks that were ready to close their doors were rehabilitated. Citizens' conservation camps were established, taking care of hundreds of thousands of young men. Additional moneys were brought into the Treasury through the repeal of prohibition. Through the passage of the National Recovery Act many millions are now working. The extensive Public Works program throughout the Nation has provided work and sustenance for millions of families. Through the enactment of the Home Loan Act, peace and security have been brought to the small-home owner throughout the Nation. The security of bank deposits has been guaranteed through the passage of proper legislation. Relief has been given to the farmers of our country. Loans to all kinds of projects have been made that would tend to put the Nation back on the path of a new prosperity.

All these things were done in order to bring these most desired results. This accomplishment has been termed the "new deal." I am in favor of adding a new plank to the new deal—that of empowering the President to make reciprocal trade agreements. I am not fearful that the President will misuse this power. I am not afraid that he will not have at heart the ultimate good of the people of the land. I trust him, because he has steered the ship straight, and I feel the ultimate accomplishments of his efforts will lead to a new and prosperous era for our beloved land.

In the past I have criticized some acts of Republican Presidents of these United States, but in no instance has my criticism been a captious one. My criticism was always uttered in a fair and dignified manner, due to the respect I had for their high office and for the orderly procedure of this House.

I have never so far forgotten myself as to accuse any of our Presidents of being guilty of legalized murder.

I am mindful of the multitude of difficulties, cares, and responsibilities pertinent to their high office, and I have always given them credit for the average performance of their duties. None of us would care to be judged by a few events in our lives; we would much prefer to have our average performance considered.

In reading the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee, we find foremost leaders of industry favoring the granting of this power to the President. The President himself in his message to Congress states:

The exercise of the authority which I propose must be carefully weighed in light of the latest information so as to give assurance that no sound and important American interests will be injuriously disturbed. The adjustment of our foreign trade relations must rest on the promise of undertaking to benefit and not injure such interests. In times of difficulty and unemployment such as this the highest consideration of the position of the different branches of American production is required.

In the light of all these statements, and of the knowledge that the act for reciprocal trade agreements is but another plank in the new deal for the recovery of the Republic, I shall stand with the President and do all that I can to help the return of prosperity to our land. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for H.R. 8687, which gives the President the power to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries, authorizing him to reduce or raise tariff duties 50 percent by Executive order. My reasons for this grant of power are as follows:

IT WILL INCREASE FOREIGN TRADE

First. I believe there is still a chance to secure for this country a reasonable share of the world's trade. I want to try to secure it. It will not come to us without the understanding and continual readjustments possible under this bill.

Second. I dread to see the day come when this country sets its face solidly against exchange with other nations and fixes its course absolutely toward nationalism.

Third. I am for the bill because I stand for a planned middle course between economic nationalism and internationalism. It will be most difficult to steer this course, but it must be done for our own prosperity as well as for the world's peace and happiness.

Fourth. I am firmly convinced that the nationalistic spirit so prevalent in the world today will inevitably lead to distrust, to hatred, and finally to war. World trade relations have, from the most ancient times, brought about cultural contacts and relationships which have made for the progress we call civilization. This process must be continued or retrogression will be inevitable. Trade between nations leads toward peace and toward mutual understanding which is the greatest preventive of war. Isolation is not an insurance against political world entanglements and trade alliances do most emphatically insure against war. I am for this bill because I am against war.

Fifth. I know full well that we cannot tear down all tariff walls and admit, free of duty, all the products of the pauperized labor of Asia and Europe. We must maintain and guarantee that which we have temporarily lost through greed among our own people—the universally high standard of living in America. Nevertheless there are plenty of people in the world, beside ourselves, who could and would use our surplus wheat, fruit, and cotton. This bill will give to the executive branch of our Government the right and power to act expeditiously to close the trade bargains with other nations without bringing them back to this slow-moving, much-talking Congress.

Sixth. I am for the bill for the reason that I do not want to see weeds grow on almost one half of the acres now devoted to cotton, and one fifth of the acres devoted to wheat abandoned. I do not want to see the apple, pear, and cherry orchards of the Northwest, with their perfect fruits, destroyed. I believe our President can find countries which will take our useful products and give us in exchange those commodities that we cannot produce to advantage. In the Pacific Northwest two thirds of all our wheat and fruit must find a market outside of our own wheat- and fruit-producing States. I have said that under present world conditions a sufficient foreign market for our agricultural surplus is an iridescent dream. That is true. This bill affords the opportunity to change those conditions. The alternative to world trade is a hideous thing and startles one who envisions a future of idle hands, idle people, checked ambition, and destroyed initiative.

Seventh. I would go further than this bill and say to those countries that now have the right to send their goods into this country free of duty, "We will no longer take your coffee, your tea, nor your raw silk unless you take in exchange a quantity of our agricultural surplus equal in value to that which you sell us."

Eighth. The knowledge that our exports have fallen in 5 years to less than one third of what they were in 1929 unquestionably warns us that drastic action must be taken at once if we are to remain a trading and a prosperous Nation.

Ninth. We have seven millions of our population directly engaged in foreign business and shipping. They must find places in other already overcrowded occupations if we retire permanently from foreign trade.

Tenth. I am for this bill because we must act quickly. Investigation and agreements will, of necessity, be conducted without publicity when they are the task of the executive department and not of the deliberative, legislative department of our Government.

Eleventh. I am for the bill because 48 other countries have invested similar power in their executives. We must be ready and able to meet them in the field of barter and trade. I repeat, it can be done only by the Executive. Congress would spend days, weeks, or months debating proposed agreements while other nations, with more quickly responsive systems, would take advantage of the commercial openings we would lose.

Twelfth. I have listened with interest to the arguments on constitutionality and have been convinced that our Constitution is sufficiently flexible to give us the right and the power to act as wisdom dictates for our own social welfare and our economic self-preservation. There would be no question of the constitutionality of this act in time of war. The condition today is vastly more dangerous than threat of foreign war.

Thirteenth. I believe the President can safely be entrusted with this very extraordinary power.

DISPOSAL OF AGRICULTURAL SURPLUS

The administration is striking at the so-called "agricultural surplus" from two directions; first, reduced acreage; second, increased purchasing power among the people. Now, it is our privilege and duty to give to the President another and most valuable power to reduce this troublesome surplus by trading with other nations which are short on foodstuffs but have something we desire, to give us in return.

Even though it be the economic policy of the new deal to seek to increase consumption, we can never absorb our entire output of wheat and cotton, if we produce to capacity. We must trade them for something that we want which we do not produce at all or not in quantity.

It will cost the Agricultural Adjustment fund almost $3,000,000 to take our surplus wheat for 1933 out of the Pacific Northwest. Should we have the crop during 1934 that now appears possible, with a surplus of 60,000,000 bushels, the cost to the Adjustment fund may be as much as $20,000,000 for the coming year. Already we hear bitter criticism from the Gulf and Atlantic wheat dealers who have found our wheat from the Pacific Northwest further depressing prices in their markets. How much better it will be when our President can say to China, "We will take so much of your tea for a stated amount of our wheat from the Pacific Northwest." The same can be said to Brazil for a certain quantity of coffee.

HOME PRICES FOR SURPLUS CROPS FIXED BY FOREIGN MARKETS

It is true that 90 percent of our total products from farm and factory are consumed in this country, but the price of that 90 percent, which spells disaster or success to farm and factory owner, is fixed by laws of trade, at the price paid for the surplus in the foreign country. That is the condition we seek to cure by this bill. We are importers of wool; hence the tariff duties keep out the cheap wool from South America and wool growers are, even today, receiving a fair price for that farm product. We raise 20 percent more wheat than we can consume. Had we, the wheat growers, been obliged to sell that excess in foreign markets, at world prices without Government interference, then wheat would be selling in Chicago today for 50 cents a bushel, and the wheat growers of Oregon would today be receiving at the delivery station not over 20 cents a bushel. These wheat farmers should ever remember that the Roosevelt administration gave us the voluntary allotment plan for farm relief and removed our surplus from the Pacific Northwest at the cost of millions. By Government action the price received by the growers of wheat has been and is today double what it would be had it not been for Roosevelt and his administration. In the face of what he has done we can certainly trust him with all the authority this bill gives him to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with other countries.

FOREIGN TRADE OUR ONLY HOPE

For more than a half century wheat has poured in an unbroken golden stream out of the Pacific Northwest, first in vessels around the Horn and then by way of the Canal, into the ports of northwestern Europe, where it found a ready market because we were buying goods freely from those nations. Before the World War we were a debtor nation with an annual outgo for interest of $200,000,000. Now we are a creditor nation with nations owing us $500,000,000 annually for interest alone. Is it any wonder they have repudiated? We refuse their goods in payment and they have not the gold. Now, the only way to do business with those nations is by reciprocal trade agreements. Our hope, and our only one, lies in revival of foreign trade. Two thirds of the world's shipping is now tied up at docks and wharves and no longer sailing the Seven Seas. Every major nation of the globe is striving to be economically self-contained, at the same time increasing armies and armaments in a furious race for equality or superiority. This can lead only to one fatal catastrophe—another world war—which may fatally wound and wreck our civilization and all the accumulated wisdom and culture of the ages. How can we contemplate this destruction of our international amity without resolving to act quickly and effectively to reestablish the status of our most favored and most happy period of friendly and mutually profitable intercourse?

NATIONALISM

Our Republican friends across the aisle, by refusing to support this bill, point the way toward excessive nationalism. Should America be forced to go all the road and actually become self-contained, there must follow compulsory control of all marketing with licensing of plowed-land quotas and with Government control of surpluses. What? Make a public utility out of agriculture, subjecting it to the same control? Perhaps so. Our emergency legislation has been admittedly experimental. The depression has sent us a long, long way down the dark road and we really do not know where we are going; we are just feeling our way. I know all the world is moving toward nationalism. The only hope of escape is the passing of bills like this. America can, and must, exert a vast world influence toward a better world atmosphere, where the arts of peace and not the acts of war shall be taught and practiced.

I know full well that modern machinery has tended to make manufactured products in every country very much alike. American-made shoe machines make it possible for Czechoslovakia to drive North American made shoes out of South America. American machines in China and Japan are making it extremely difficult for the cotton and woolen mills of New England to hold their own in the markets of the world. But, machines do not wipe out all national differences in ability and genius. Ever since Thomas Jefferson formulated the Declaration of Independence and abolished the law of primogeniture, which gave all to the eldest son, America has pointed the way toward a fairer social order for the common man—a juster government, more equal opportunity, a greater freedom. After setting the pace, leading the world for a century and a half, are we now to close our ports, slow down our factories, allow our fields to lie idle? Shall we say to the cotton men of the Southland, "Yes, formerly one half of your cotton was sold in foreign ports; it cannot be so now, and half your acres must grow weeds"? Are we, as a nation, to say to the wheat farmers of my State, Oregon, "Yes, one half of all your wheat has in former years been sold in foreign markets; but we are now a self-contained Nation, and one half your wheat acreage must lie fallow"? That is not the spirit that made America great, the spirit of '76, or the spirit of our boys in the Argonne Woods. The American Revolution made possible the French Revolution, and the French Revolution made possible the English industrial revolution. As we have led in free government, so we have led in agriculture and in industry. Shall we now renounce that leadership?

It is certainly an anomaly that nations, which have for three centuries sailed the seas and now span them with lines of floating palaces in safe and speedy travel; nations which, through the genius of man, find it possible to talk or to fly across the rolling waves; should erect barriers against trade. It is a tragedy for such nations to allow their selfish fears so to control them that they embark on the road toward national isolation, which means ultimate ruin for them all. This bill will put into the hands of the President the power to break the evil spell under which we go astray; power to create a more wholesome world feeling; safer world relations.

MODERN SOCIAL FORCES DEVELOPED

About a century and a half ago three great social movements or trends became apparent and began to grow: First, government by representation; second, modern capitalism; third, the spirit of nationalism.

Quite well do I know there has been so-called "republics" before ours, and that the foundation blocks were hewn out in England centuries ago for the structure of free representative government, but in America was the first real attempt at government of the people in the interests of the people. Our national growth, strength, and power will remain the marvel of all the ages. We have made and produced everything that man wants and desires in such profusion and quantity that warehouses and granaries are bursting with their overabundance. On the other hand, our prosperity is so ill-adjusted that only a comparatively few can enjoy this abundance. The free Government of America and its creative, independent spirit have provided an abundance, but there has been the tragic and ugly failure to divide, with any degree of equity, the rewards of human toil. Our representative government has been betrayed by powerful groups created by special privilege.

Developing and growing along with our new country has come capitalism based on profits, interest, and dividends. Capitalism has been largely responsible for our excessive and callous individualism. The inventor has been rewarded and encouraged until he has filled the world with machines which would today make this earth a paradise for millions, provided they were used for the benefit of all, instead of being made the tools for enslaving men for the benefit of the selfish, greedy owners. As America has proved both her worth and her unworthiness, so has capitalism ripened and matured until capitalistic society has brought bitterness into the minds and hearts of the masses.

As free representative government and capitalistic society have developed, flowered, and borne fruit, the spirit of nationalism has traced the same line of growth and borne the same bitter fruits. Love of home and native heath have been extant from the beginning of civilization, but intense, inbred nationalism has come since the boys of the Gironde commenced to sing the Marseillaise during the French Revolution, and the conscript armies of Napoleon's time commenced their marches into the capitals of Europe. Since the great World War, in which all nations were engulfed without comprehension, then or now, of the reasons impelling to the massacre, this spirit has been intensified by fear, propaganda, and calculated greed, and now the appeal comes to us to yield once more to this destructive menace.

These three major social, political, and economic movements, starting at about the same time, developing through the same century and a half, and flowering in our time, have, through misdirection of their finest qualities been bred to produce chaos and despair. What wrecked these forces which might have been beneficent? Our representative government suffers from the domination of the great financial interests which have led to corruption and distrust. Nationalism has been perverted by war profiteers. The capitalistic system has been made repulsive by greedy demands for excessive interest for the use of money. Representative government, nationalism, capitalism—all must be rescued from the domineering greed which has been willing to wreck them to build fortunes. Let us preserve them and use them for the common good. We have come to the crossroads. The way is plain.

THE CHALLENGE TO AMERICA

But yet, what a challenge to those who understand the forces of nature and man, and have the will to convert these movements into factors for social betterment. The talk of return to normalcy and of rugged individualism is idle and irresponsible. We can never go back to those happy days, those pioneer days of fertile, unbroken acres freely given by a generous government, to days of westward treks, of mining booms, and cities springing up as if by magic. However, American ability and genius, which has solved every difficulty from Puritan and Cavalier days, can find a solution for our problems of adjustment and readjustment. A jobless, hungry, ragged, discouraged world of millions extends begging hands asking for a chance to labor, to eat, and to wear.

Constitutionality of the proposed law does not worry me as much as do these hungry millions. They beg of us that we grant opportunity to live securely; but they know, and we know, that the powers which control their fates and their futures are not here on this floor where they should be. Is it not even possible to give insight and understanding to those who control our financial destinies so they may understand that their own safety depends on a planned economic life which will guarantee jobs and give security in them through social insurance? Can they not be made to understand that youth, sickness, and old age must be cared for in a decently ordered society? Cannot those powerful ones who control nations see that another world war may end all and send us back into days like those that followed the moving of the Roman capital from the Tiber? Cannot those who control be brought to understand that excessive nationalism is sure to ripen into hatred, distrust, clashing of interests, and finally war? Cannot those who control see that enormous interest and dividends cannot be paid and must lead to repudiation? Can they not comprehend the fact that nations can be mutually tolerant and helpful only when they trade and traffic freely among themselves? Why not make all our international dealings just and natural, and break down barriers erected by greed and privilege and tradition? This bill is an attempt to simplify and to speed international trade agreements. It is an aid to and a part of the new deal.

Why are we so helpless in the face of greed and injustice? Why not recapture our Government from these evil forces, which exert such undue influence, and which through wealth and position gained by special economic privileges wield political power? That recapture is also part of our new deal.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL].

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, men may come and men may go, but taxes go on forever; and taxes or tariffs are the controversial issues in this bill.

In levying taxes or delegating authority it depends very largely upon whose ox is gored as to what position men will take on the question. This has been true throughout the ages. It has been shown from the RECORD that Members on both sides of the House have changed their minds on the gag rule and the delegation of authority.

I should like to be consistent, and have tried to be, but this is impossible at times, especially when one's position is based upon constitutional objections, and the Supreme Court comes along and knocks his preconceived opinions higher than a kite.

I am not a constitutional lawyer, but am a plain cornfield lawyer, and my opinions carry no weight, while the opinions of the Court carry all weight and are final. I am frank to say that had it not been for the decision of the Supreme Court rendered by Chief Justice Taft on the Tariff Act of 1922, and some earlier opinions on very similar cases, I would vote against this bill, but we must take these decisions as the last word on the construction of the Constitution.

In regard to H.R. 8687, now under consideration, will say that its purpose is very similar to the act of 1922 and other acts which sought to confer upon the Chief Executive certain authority in carrying out the expressed will of Congress, which acts have been upheld by the courts from Washington's administration to the present time.

As said by President Cleveland, "we are confronted with a condition and not a theory." This condition is so apparent that the man who runs may read.

It is the loss of world trade, and some means must be found to restore that trade to take care of our surplus products before prosperity can be restored. I do not share the expressed opinion that this trade is forever lost and is not worth consideration. It is still evident that the people of the world must eat and wear clothes, and when they cannot produce this food and clothing they must buy them from some other country; and I want my country to have an even break in supplying these products, and we do not now have that opportunity because of trade barriers erected against us because of our prohibitive tariff walls erected against their products for the protection of certain industries in this country.

I would not under any circumstances strike down our tariff laws and cripple industry, but industry has already been crippled by its own folly in stopping almost entirely the importation of foreign products into this country; and this has cut off the markets of other countries for the products of our farms and factories because it is a self-evident fact that unless other countries can sell us they cannot buy from us. No one will deny this axiomatic statement. These highly protected industries, like Samson of old, have actually pulled the house down upon themselves.

The preamble of this bill, which I will not repeat here, sets out very clearly the purposes of this bill, and then authorizes the President in paragraph (2)—

To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions or such additional import restrictions or for such continuance, and for such minimum periods of existing customs of excise treatment of any article covered by foreign-trade agreements, as are required or are appropriated to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder. No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

This is practically the same language as found in the Tariff Act of 1922 and other similar acts, except that it does not require the Tariff Commission to find the difference between the cost of producing the articles in this country and in foreign countries, but said act is still on the statutes and can be used in finding the difference in cost.

The President will doubtless avail himself of all the information necessary before raising or lowering any rate of duty, and I would be willing to amend the bill by adding the following:

In performing the duties herein conferred the President may call upon the Tariff Commission, the Ambassadors, and consuls in foreign countries, and any other agencies of the Government to furnish such information as they can secure in regard to the justness and fairness of existing rates of duty and the desirability of raising or lowering such rates of duty and entering into reciprocal trade relations with foreign countries in order to increase our foreign trade.

This would be merely persuasive, as the President already has this authority.

The President has the authority now to raise or lower tariff rates, and if this is construed as levying a tax the court has settled the matter in favor of the statute in the opinion rendered by Chief Justice Taft in the case of Hampton against United States. I quote briefly:

If it is thought wise to vary the custom duties according to changing conditions of production at home and abroad, Congress may authorize the Chief Executive to carry out this purpose, with the assistance of the Tariff Commission, appointed under congressional authority. This conclusion is amply sustained by a case in which there was no advisory commission furnished the President—a case to which this Court gave fullest consideration nearly 40 years ago.

This was the case of Field against Clark, in which the reciprocal trade provisions of the act of 1890 were under attack, in which the President was authorized to actually take articles from the free list and place them upon the dutiable list and authorize customs officers to collect the duties. This is a broader power than is conferred by this act, and it was held to be legal.

In the discussion of this case it was contended that this section delegated to the President both legislative and treaty-making powers and was unconstitutional. After an examination of all authorities the Court said:

While Congress cannot delegate legislative power to the President, this act does not in any real sense invest the President with power of legislation.

I shall have to yield my preconceived judgment in these cases to the decision of the Supreme Court, but my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Beck] is not willing to do this, and I have the highest regard for his legal opinion. He must concede, however, that the authority of the Supreme Court is greater than his in construing the constitutionality of acts of Congress.

In regard to the decision on the New York milk case, I share the same views expressed by my friend [Mr. Beck], and in case the Court should uphold the cotton-control act there will remain no more protection for the personal and property rights of the people guaranteed in the Constitution, either in the States or in the Federal Government. It seems that the courts can prove anything by the Constitution, just like the preachers can prove anything by the Bible.

It must be noted, however, that these short-term trade agreements, which can be terminated at any time, are far different from long-term treaties which require Senate concurrence, like the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

As to the great necessity of taking some action to restore our foreign trade, there should be no dissenting opinion; and if a better plan than the one here presented is offered, I would be glad to support it. We are rapidly losing this trade, and unless it can be restored there is no outlet for our surplus farm and factory products, and depression is bound to continue.

Some inducements must be offered to foreign countries to get their trade, and the Dies silver bill that passed the House a few days ago is a gesture in the right direction. It offers a premium of 25 percent in the price of silver in order to induce them to buy our goods, and more than two thirds of the Members of the House voted for it.

We might secure some of this trade by a slight reduction in the tariff rates on some of the articles they desire to exchange for our surplus products, and this might be done without injury to any existing industry.

Congress cannot negotiate these reciprocal trade agreements, and must confer this authority upon some person or upon some board or commission, and I can think of no better authority than the President who will make these negotiations through the Secretary of State, or other existing governmental agencies. There is no time or necessity for approval of these trade agreements by the Senate in view of the urgency of the case, and the decisions of the court.

Without encumbering the RECORD with tables of exports and imports, which are shown in the report accompanying this bill, and some of which have already been placed in the RECORD, I desire to mention only a few instances clearly showing how rapidly our exports have fallen off, causing billions of dollars of losses to the people of this country.

During the year 1920-21 we exported 293,268,000 bushels of wheat, while during the year 1930-31 we exported only 76,216,000 bushels. This is a loss between these 2 years of 217,052,000 bushels, not counting the loss each year as our exports declined, and this applies to the losses in other products. There has been a very rapid decline the last few years, which is partly because of world depression, but not all chargeable to the depression because we have lost a greater percentage of world trade than other competing countries.

Cotton is the great money crop of the South. It has been our boast for many years that our surplus cotton went abroad and brought back hundreds of millions of dollars annually, which constitutes our balance of trade. Cotton has the greatest value of any of our export products, and the market in foreign countries must be kept open for this product or our balance of trade will be permanently lost and the entire country will suffer.

During the years 1926 to 1928, inclusive, we exported 26,511,000 bales of cotton, while during the years 1929 to 1931, inclusive, we exported only 22,158,000, a loss of 4,353,000 bales in these years. Foreign countries consumed from 60 to 70 percent of our cotton before the World War—now they consume about 50 percent of it, and if some of this export trade cannot be regained, the loss will be reflected over the entire country, and it will cause the permanent loss of our export cotton trade and increase production in other countries to supply this loss.

What has been said about cotton and wheat is true as to other export articles, and our entire export trade has been crippled by prohibitive tariff rates which virtually denies countries the opportunity to trade with us.

It has been shown by investigations in the past that certain industries in this country raised the prices of their products in this country as high as the traffic would bear under the prohibitive tariff, and when they accumulated a surplus they shipped their surpluses abroad and sold them in competing markets for half what they sold for in this country, instead of giving the home people the advantage of these reduced prices.

They cannot do this so well now, as the foreign markets are practically closed to their products, and they had to devise another scheme to hold the market in this country, and also sell in foreign countries, so they have erected plants in foreign countries and use cheap labor and compete successfully with local capital in those countries.

Time and space forbid my discussing this phase at length. Suffice to say that within recent years 711 companies from the United States have erected 1,819 plants in foreign countries, with a capital of $2,177,693,244, and employ 450,455 laborers to operate them, instead of investing that money here and employing a half million idle laborers here and paying taxes to this Government. They could have sold the products of their factories in this country without moving to other countries if it were not for our high-tariff barriers that forbid the people of other countries to trade with us on fair terms of exchange.

I want to show you one example of a prohibitive tariff, and there are many.

I am fond of hunting, and I wanted a 3-barrel gun, with 2 shotgun barrels and a rifle barrel—an all-purpose gun. I went to see a German in San Antonio, Tex., who had one of these guns made in Germany. Upon examination of the gun, I liked it very much. The man told me that it cost $35 in Germany, but it would cost $150 delivered here because of the high duty. He bought the gun for his own use, and did not want to sell it to me.

I wrote a sporting-goods firm in New York for prices on these guns, and they said that they did not keep them in stock but could get me one from Germany in about 60 days, and it would cost $150, delivered. I ordered the gun, and it came in about 2 months, and I am well pleased with it, but the price is so high, because of the tariff, that few of them are sold in this country. They should be sold for $50 with a reasonable duty, and a great many people would buy them and the Government would get considerable revenue, while it now gets very little because few people buy the guns.

I do not believe in free trade. It is a beautiful theory but will not work in practice. I believe in a moderate duty fairly well distributed over most all imported articles.

It was said of Hamilton, "He smote the rock of national resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth." Tariffs were levied for revenue in those days, and it was thought that if the tariff were levied for any other purpose it would be illegal.

Robert J. Walk, of Alabama, Secretary of the Treasury under President Polk, was one of the greatest authorities in this country on the tariff, and he was the real author of the Tariff Act of 1846, which produced an era of prosperity throughout the country, lasting until the Civil War in 1861. He laid down certain fundamental rules to guide Congress in adopting tariff laws, but time will not permit a discussion of them, but I will mention a few:

First:

That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.

Second:

That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third:

That below such rate discriminations may be made, descending in the scale duties, or for imperative reasons the article may be placed on the list of those free from all duty.

Fourth:

That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth:

That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

This plan of levying tariff duties has never been improved upon, but has constantly been violated by discriminations against the South and West and has impoverished those sections for the benefit of the tariff-protected barons.

It is time the tariff should be adjusted to operate equally and fairly throughout the country and give the producers of farm products some of its benefits. It is fundamental that the tariff cannot protect the growers of surplus products that must be sold in a foreign market.

The tariff of 42 cents per bushel helps the wheat grower very little, if any, and a tariff of $5 per pound on cotton would not help the cotton growers.

In order to help the growers of cotton and wheat, the two great export products, we must make trade agreements with the countries that want these products, so that they can pay us for our products, and the Congress cannot do that by enacting a tariff law which would apply to all countries, whether they bought our products or not.

We propose, under this bill, to lower our tariff only to those that will lower their embargoes against our products and permit us to exchange our products for theirs—a plan beneficial to both countries, and I believe this will open new fields for the exchange of manufactured products as well as raw products.

My young friend from Nebraska [Mr. CARPENTER] is greatly alarmed for fear Secretary Wallace or Dr. Tugwell will administer this law in the interest of the Cuban sugar-cane growers against the beet-sugar growers in Nebraska. I believe his fears are not well founded, and he has been ably answered by his colleague from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER], who is supporting this bill, and is certainly well informed as to the beet-sugar situation in Nebraska, and he does not fear that the President will injure the beet-sugar growers in Nebraska. I agree with Mr. CARPENTER that the cane-sugar and the beet-sugar industries should not be curtailed in their output, but should be allowed to increase their production, because we do not produce half what we consume, and by increasing the production we take cotton land out of production in the South and wheat land out of production in the West, and this is desirable.

Sugar is cheap and I would be willing to raise the tariff to 3 cents per pound in order to increase production. It is the best revenue producer we have and the tariff should not be reduced.

We are closing down oil wells in this country because of overproduction, and I should like to see the tariff raised on petroleum to limit imports, and these propositions should be adjusted for the best interest of our people.

It is not advisable to enact a general tariff law at this session, but after negotiations are had under this bill for reciprocal trade agreements, the President probably can recommend to Congress at its next session what permanent changes should be made in the tariff laws.

This law is temporary and is intended to get quick action before Congress can act on the whole tariff problem, and give us immediate relief in moving our surplus products into the channels of trade, and increase the buying power of the farmer and start the wheels of industry to turning and revive the drooping spirits of idle laborers by giving them a job instead of a dole.

While I am not in favor of cancelation of the foreign debts, which we cannot collect, I would be willing to include in the authority granted the President the scaling of these debts as much as 25 percent on every dollar that foreign countries will spend for our products, in order to still further increase our foreign trade and stimulate recovery. The enactment of this law is pressingly and immediately desirable as a means of stimulating recovery.

In conclusion, permit me to say that from time immemorial the nations that carried on the greatest commercial intercourse with the countries of the world have been the most prosperous nations of the world.

When Rome brought to her capital the wealth of the northern countries conquered by Caesar and her ships were laden with commerce of all countries and all roads led to Rome, she was the proud mistress of the world in wealth, culture, science, and civilization; but when this wealth began to encourage luxury and indolence and dulled the energy and enterprise of her people she lost her trade and commerce and soon ceased to be the proud Empire of the Caesars.

When Spain set her sails to win the commerce of the world, and Columbus discovered the Western Hemisphere, and her bold sailors, Ponce de Leon, Balboa, and Magellan roamed the wilderness of the western world, and Spain reveled in the riches of the Incas and the Montezumas, she became one of the mightiest nations of the earth, but when she lost her foreign trade and her western possessions to England her prestige began to decline and now she is only a third-rate nation.

China, one of the oldest nations of the earth, built a great wall 1,500 miles in length, almost across the continent, to keep her civilization from being contaminated by inferior races, and now she sits alone in darkness refusing to profit by the experience of more enlightened seafaring nations—the easy prey of all aggressive, enterprising, commercial nations.

England, a country less in area than my own State, began to extend her commerce as that of Spain declined, and she has continued to extend that trade with all nations until she became the mistress of the seas, with possessions upon which the sun never sets, and her ships are sailing the seven seas carrying her commerce to all the ports of the world. She brings her gold from South Africa to exchange for grain in the western world to feed her people who work in factories to make the goods that go to the uttermost ends of the earth. This is trade. This is commerce. And no nation has ever retained its supremacy when its trade is lost.

We cannot live alone and prosper. No nation has ever prospered when left alone and shut out from the trade of the world. We are in a deep eddy of commercial stagnation, and every effort to prime the pump and push the ship to a safe commercial landing must be made.

Thomas Jefferson declared that—

Agriculture, manufacture, commerce, and navigation are the four pillars of our prosperity.

And he exhorted us to—

Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—entangling alliances with none.

And we should heed this exhortation throughout the ages. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Ford].

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, we are all well aware of the fact that either some 50,000,000 acres of fairly good farm land must be withdrawn from cultivation by our farmers or markets abroad must be secured for the products of as large a part of those 50,000,000 acres as seems possible. We are also convinced that lost markets for standard American industrial products must be regained.

If we fail to secure those markets, heart-breaking readjustments will become inevitable, as the President warned us in his message of March 2.

In that message the President shows how the success of wise tariff bargaining for the common good is dependent upon expert negotiation, swift decisions, and the authority to propose, discuss, accept, and reject proposals.

It is clear that such negotiations as these are not possible by this or any other legislative body. It is for us to decide upon the policy to be pursued. To put that policy into effect we must delegate authority.

The President requests that authority. And he tells us frankly how he will use it and to what end.

His policy is clear: To stimulate our exports by agreeing to take for them classes and types of imports that are as nearly as possible noncompetitive.

The argument put forth by those who have made no study of the subject is that foreign trade is of little importance to our people because it constitutes in normal times only some 10 percent of our total commerce. I maintain that we cannot afford to cut down our business activities and our employment 10 percent. It has been shown that over 9,000,000 of our people make their living in foreign trade. Are they of no consequence?

An analysis of our export trade reveals the clear fact that it is of paramount importance to most of our farmers. Regularly in normal times from one half to two thirds of our cotton, one fifth or more of our wheat, one third of our tobacco, and at least one third of our corn and hog products are sold abroad.

It becomes clear, then, that either we must restore our lost markets for these major products or we must cut production. Here is where the painful readjustments come in. To cut production means to force many long-established farmers into the cities, where there is no work for them. Such a national policy is fraught with tragedy. Homes will be broken up, people set adrift, while fertile acres will lie untilled.

Such tragedy must be averted. If anything will destroy our democracy it is to passively permit such conditions to develop. But they will develop unless we handle our tariff making in the modern way, unless we make trading agreements by which our farm and factory surpluses are marketed abroad, and at the same time definitely determine what foreign products we shall take in exchange for our exports.

For the 12 years preceding March 4, 1933, the United States went on producing huge surpluses for export, without providing for any sound basis of payment. No thought of readjustments was taken. We knew, our Government knew, our bankers knew, our industrialists knew, and our farmers and workers knew that exports of goods and services can be paid for only by imports of goods and services. And yet in a mad rush for immediate profits all of these closed their eyes to the plain facts and went on producing enormous surpluses for export, with no plan as to a return trade.

Under our iniquitous tariff policy only one method was left whereby our enormous surpluses could continue to be exported. That method is well known to the Members of this Congress and to their constituents. It was to extend loans to our customers abroad. To do this our international bankers and high priests of finance arranged to market and in many cases to underwrite at an unholy profit public and private securities issued by foreign states or municipalities or by foreign corporations. Thereby credit was made available to finance our exports. The estimates of the total securities thus marketed in the United States vary from fourteen to seventeen billions of dollars.

Who paid for them? The innocent American investor. Who recommended them? The equally innocent American international banker, whose innocence in this case was either culpable ignorance or culpable greed. Who had a quasi-Government approval? Andrew Mellon, the greatest promoter of all times.

Now, throughout this land we have old people and middle-aged people who put their all in these foreign securities and who have thereby lost their all. Many of them are actually on charity.

It is not my purpose at this time to go further into this tragic chapter of American finance. The facts are well known and the economic unsoundness of that policy is now generally admitted.

But in passing I wish to register my protest against any revival of the policy of making foreign loans to stimulate American exports. To do so is to return to the policy of Mellon and of the Presidents who relied upon him. There is profit for a few in such a course. But that profit is at the expense of the many. Only if our export bank just organized confines its operations to making short-term credit arrangements with Russia and Cuba, can it pretend to be economically sound. Those credits should be extended only on sound assurances and agreements that they shall be canceled within a short period by the receipt of such imports or services as this Nation can afford to accept. An extension of the operations of this bank on any other basis should be opposed by Congress in the interest of the American people.

The President states the bold and unpalatable truth in his message of March 2 when he says:

American exports cannot be permanently increased without a corresponding increase of imports.

That is the basic fact. It is fundamental. Because previous administrations and previous majorities in Congress have been ignorant or unmindful of this fact, our people have suffered tragic losses and our whole system of economics and of government has been undermined and threatened.

The one and only sound method of stimulating exports is to decide what imports and services are to be taken in exchange for those exports. Trade is trade, whether it is national or international. In the long run, goods and services pay for goods and services. There is no other sound way.

Thank God the President knows this and his Secretary of State and his Secretary of Commerce know it. There is to be no hocus-pocus here, no attempted magic by which we sell to foreigners and profit by taking nothing in return. It cannot be done, gentlemen. If we are to sell abroad, we must buy there. That fact is as true as though it were written on tablets of stone by a superior and all-wise being.

It remains, then, to decide what imports we shall take for our surplus exports and what countries we shall take them from, and how we shall reach the wise decision. The President has the answer, as he has it to so many other exigent problems.

It is by reciprocal trade treaties.

If the plan involved the lowering of tariffs on competitive products from abroad, whereby established American industries might suffer, we would none of us be for it. Neither would the President. He knows that certain industries need protection, just as we know it.

Listening to the partisan attacks made on this proposal, the implication is that the President will use this power to betray and to ruin established agricultural or manufacturing industries. This is absurd and insulting.

We have in the White House a man whom we can trust. He will not work harm to any established industry. He will make only such tariff agreements as will benefit our people. And he will make them expeditiously, as opportunity offers, and in exchange for very definite advantages.

I am confident that if this grant of authority were put to a vote in my State, the people would endorse it by an overwhelming majority.

With no partisan bias, with the greatest good to the greatest number, with national recovery as the aim, with sound economic principles as their basis, I believe that reciprocal trade agreements can be made by executive negotiations and agreement. And I believe that we can entrust President Roosevelt with the authority to do this. He has the wisdom and the integrity. He knows his economics. He has at heart only one purpose, and that is to add to the happiness and the opportunities of the American people. To secure for them, in his own phrase, "a more abundant life." Let us take this next step in the recovery program. Let us delegate to the President the authority he asks and show that we have the same confidence in our leader that all America has. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it is amusing to watch the two old parties wrangling on this question of trade agreements. In 1929 the Democratic Party waged a hard fight to prevent the then President Hoover from exercising rights under the flexible clauses of the tariff act, and now the Republican Party is opposing with all of their strength to giving trade-agreement powers to our distinguished leader in the White House.

We are faced with an emergency, and one that needs immediate action. The President is equal to this emergency and I know that he will act to the best interests of all of the people of this great country. Economic conditions of great importance are changing daily and with those changes we must be in a position to take full advantage so that our foreign trade will be best provided for.

I am confident in the leadership of Mr. Roosevelt. I am confident that he will see that the farmers and laborers of this country will get a square deal. I know that through trade agreements that can be executed when this body is not in session our Nation will be able to get the greatest possible benefits in furthering our foreign trade. I am fully aware that with the authority to raise and lower tariffs, the President will be in a good position to take advantage of every opportunity to further trade relations with other countries.

Never is legislation introduced that is not in many ways an experiment, and this is no exception. It is human to make mistakes, and I am confident that if any are made, the President will be quick to correct them under this bill. The President can, as the need arises, act quickly and dispose of our surplus agricultural and manufactured products in the world markets to the best advantage of the American people.

As a Member of the Senate 10 years ago—and I cite this as an example—I introduced a resolution which called upon the Tariff Commission to investigate the amount of butter being imported into this country and its effect on the domestic butter market. The Tariff Commission took approximately 6 months to investigate and, following their report, recommending a higher duty on butter, delay followed delay, and it took nearly 2 years before the increased duty became effective. I believe this will show the Congress the urgent need for action and passage of this bill at this time.

When I came to this country 43 years ago the first thing I found out about the two old parties was their different views on the tariff. Now, during this time the Democrats talked low tariffs and free trade, and for a like number of years Republicans have been singing the praises of the high tariff. I was not a Member of Congress when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill became a law, but I am familiar with the contents of it, and I must say that the Republican Party has gone the full way of tariff powers in that bill. They have built a high wall over which products that our people can use from other countries cannot come in, and at the same time they have by this action served notice to other nations to do the same thing, making it impossible for us to trade with them.

I am sure that this measure will give the President the power that will enable him to make necessary changes and I know that he will do this at all times bearing in mind the needs of our people. It is needless for me to tell this Congress how, under the Smoot-Hawley Act, our trade relations with other countries dropped to unusually low marks, and that under this act it was impossible for our President, even under the flexible clause known as "336", to do anything about it. Give him a chance. I am sure he is worthy of an opportunity to revive our world trade. Surely he is in an excellent position to do so. Should this program fail Congress can remedy this in a few months.

The Republican Party never misses an opportunity to set up the cry of communism and socialism and revolution in this country, and are using every means that they know to make the people believe that the country is headed for disaster because we are departing from the reactionary policies of the previous administration. They are now trying to instill into the minds of the American people that the emergency measures that the President is asking for are a departure from the Constitution, and that the rights of our citizens are being taken away. I hope that they will not be misled in this. I have faith in the President and I know that he is trying to do everything he can to bring us out of the hole and restore us to normalcy again.

Selfish conservative leaders representing special privilege and big business have always dictated and have had written their own legislation. They have always dominated business and government to such an extent that they have choked the masses of our people and have not let up, nor will they, until everything has been taken from them.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I yield.

Mr. HOEPEL. The gentleman is apparently referring to the Republicans, is he not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Surely, surely.

It is because of the reactionary leaders that we are in the plight we find ourselves today, and there is no one who can deny this. Their selfishness and greed is only surpassed by their stubbornness in relinquishing to the common man a small portion of that which they have taken from him.

Progressive leaders of other countries have gone far in adopting trade relations and trade agreements with each other, and I cite the splendid liberal leadership of the Scandinavian countries in this respect. I believe the President should have the authority to deal with foreign nations so that he can place our goods in world channels most effectively. [Applause.]

For years and years the Republican Party has opposed the granting to the Philippine Islands their independence, and have always dismissed this problem by stating that as soon as the islands were ready for their freedom they would grant it to these people. Well, ladies and gentlemen of this Congress, they are ready, and they have been ready for many years. No one can deny but what they should be entitled to self-government. I have a bill in Congress that would give these people their freedom within approximately 2 years. A bill that meets with the approval of the great masses of Filipino people. The people want this bill; the press of the islands has denounced other measures that meant independence in name only, and which would never grant the people the freedom they are certainly entitled to.

The bill which I have introduced is the companion measure of Senator KING's, and is the legislation that the people of the islands have been begging Congress to endorse. The passage of this bill would have meant once and for all the elimination of a market of oils and fats not desired by the American dairy farmer. It would have meant the elimination forever of this menace of a market which I am sure everyone in this Congress would like to see eliminated. Here is an island that offers nothing in the way of trade reciprocity with the United States and yet floods this country with products that are in direct competition with our dairy and sugar farmers. We sell little if nothing to the islands, and it is trivial to the tremendous flood of raw products shipped into this country by this little group out in the Pacific.

The Republican Party of my State—and this holds true for this same party throughout the Nation—have represented the special interests of this country. They have forgotten the great rank and file that voted religiously for them. Unmindful of this solemn pledge they gave the people, they have exploited them almost beyond recovery. Under the false leadership of this once great party, the country kept sinking further and further into debt. Our farmers, as the result of the exploitation of the Republican Party, have lost their holdings through mortgage foreclosures, sagging markets, and a concentration of wealth on the part of Republican hierarchy.

The Republican Party suffered defeat at the hands of the voters in the last election, and it would be assumed that this defeat at the polls would have served notice on them to change their leadership, but they have not. Under the banner of the men who championed the rugged individualism of Herbert Hoover, Andrew Mellon, Grundy, and Vare, this selfsame Republican Party has asked to lead it in this House of Representatives many of the men who were responsible for putting into law the measures which have spelled ruin and disaster to this country.

It has been this leadership under the past Republican administration that passed the Esch-Cummins Act and the Smoot-Hawley Act. It was a Republican Congress that sustained the President's veto to give the worthy soldiers of this country the bonus, allowing all of this time to elapse so as to enable the bankers to drive a hard bargain and collect millions of dollars in interest on these certificates that should have been paid in cash.

They blocked the farmer at every turn of the road. They placed thorns in his side with idle words of aid which they had written into their party platform. They failed to pass the Frazier bill that millions of our clear-thinking and intelligent farmers were asking for. They served notice on the industrial workers of this country that they did not take cognizance of their needs, because in the years of Republican misrule they ignored the demands of organized and unorganized labor. In all of the last 12 years of Republican administration nowhere can we find evidences of good faith to the masses of people that go to make up this great Nation. However, we do find many evidences of the fingers of special privilege. We find the conservative wing of the Republican Party grasping everything and only the tricklings were allowed to drop through for the common man.

For years they have condoned the actions of our bankers and brokers. Instead of safeguarding the bank deposits of the millions of our people who placed faith in the Nation's banking system they watched this country's credit topple without doing anything about it. Their inaction cannot be laid at the door of stupidity. It can be and should be charged to their selfishness and greed. And when on that eventful day the stock market crashed and the earnings and the savings of millions of people were wiped out, nowhere can we find the G.O.P. offering any solutions to the problems.

For years they had been warned by liberal leaders as to the certain disaster they were headed for because of their misrule. Liberals have urged legislation that would spread the benefits of government, and yet in the knowledge of impending disaster these stubborn reactionary leaders would not yield. And now in the face of an overwhelming defeat they still cling tenaciously to that same leadership. Today's vote on this measure will bear this out. When the roll is called on this bill we are going to find the names of those who have for years stamped their seal of approval upon all of the conservative and reactionary measures that the people are now trying to erase.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN].

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the extended remarks of the opposition to this bill for the past few days, I might, if I had not been guilty of having to sell corn for 10 cents a bushel during the last few years, think that perhaps this Nation had realized great prosperity under the high protective tariff which we have had during the past administration. In view of that fact, I am inclined to take an opposite position and to feel that we are now undertaking a very important portion of the recovery program of this Nation, namely, a provision that will make it possible for the President of the United States to effect reciprocal trade treaties that will bring to this country the business and foreign trade it needs.

I feel that many of us do not accord the tariff the degree of importance it deserves. I am reminded of a story Woodrow Wilson told quite frequently to illustrate the important part the tariff plays in our economic picture. He likened it to the street plan of the great city of Boston. He said that a man who was standing at the entrance of one of the railway stations accosted a Bostonian and asked him which street he might take that would lead to the Common. The Bostonian replied, "Take any of these streets going in any direction and sooner or later you will come to the Common." So it is with American business. It is closely associated with the problem of the tariff. Regardless of what line of endeavor it might be, it is wrapped up in this picture of our relations with the rest of the world. For that reason it is of vital importance.

As a farmer and one interested in agricultural production, I feel it is only fitting and proper that we consider the tariff briefly from that particular angle. I hope the farmers of our Nation are coming to realize more and more that when they buy their steel tools and implements they are paying the tariff. Apparently they had not realized it prior to the last election. I hope the housewives of those American farmers will realize that when they buy aluminum utensils and things of that nature they are paying the tariff, and that the proceeds of those rates are thereby going into the coffers of American industrial giants, sometimes plaintively called "infant industries." I am fully aware of the fact that this country must be supported by certain tariff duties for revenue purposes, but when they get too high their prohibitive effect upon imports reduces rather than increases our national income.

I feel that we cannot in a surplus-producing country such as this continue with agricultural production unless we adopt one of three courses—either a plan of extreme nationalism, one of internationalism that will eventually absorb those surpluses, or a middle course that would have some marked advantages.

It is perfectly fitting and proper to my mind that we choose temporarily the course of nationalism in order to take care of an emergency; but, certainly, we should not follow it to its ultimate conclusion of State socialism. We should, in my opinion, adopt a policy of relations with the rest of the world that will make it possible to absorb farm and industrial surpluses. As the gentleman from Oregon so ably said a few moments ago, we should not, in this wealthy Nation and in this wealthy world, permit one fourth, or at least a large percentage, of our agricultural lands to lie idle and progressive, able farmers to go without work when there are people in this universe who are hungry. Which only reminds me of a story one of the largest grain dealers in America told me. I was riding on a train with him and in the course of conversation he said:

"A few months ago I was in the vast country of China talking to one of the largest Chinese merchants in the Orient. While we were visiting a parade marched by along the street and those Chinese were carrying banners. I asked the merchant what the banners said, and he replied, 'My friend, they read something like this: We do not want to have anything to do with America; America starves us.'"

My friend said to the Chinese merchant: "We do not starve anyone; far from it; we are extremely solicitous for the welfare of human beings", to which he replied: "If that be true, then I would like to have you go with me to certain sections of this great Chinese city."

Together they went into various portions of Peking; and as they were riding through the streets the merchant pointed to Chinese people sitting in the gutter eating the guts of chickens and fish, fish heads, and refuse they had gathered from the gutter. The Chinese merchant said to my friend: "There, sir, is an example of people who are starving today because America will not exchange with us some of her surplus wheat for the things we can produce to good advantage." [Applause.]

There is much to be said for a middle path between economic internationalism and nationalism as far as American agriculture is concerned. A permanent policy of limited production in the face of our expansive capacities certainly seems unwise until we experiment with the possibility of rebuilding our foreign trade after its more or less complete collapse that has followed in the wake of recent policies of protection. Like many others I can see that great prosperity is possible for us under the banner of strict nationalism, but in order that the desired end may be realized we must accept a regimentation of agriculture, industry, and all other lines far beyond that which we are now experiencing or have even suggested. It appears to me that human nature in this boundlessly free country will not submit to it except in this emergency that is warlike in characteristics.

In my opinion, we should at least choose the middle course and begin a program of planned trade relations with the rest of the world. Unless we do that we cannot expect to dispose of possible surpluses in the field of agriculture or collect past debts. In previous remarks of mine on the floor of this House I indicated that there are three recognized methods of doing business—cash, credit, and exchange. It is perfectly obvious to any thinking individual that either of the first two methods must necessarily terminate in economic disaster if there is no exchange of goods and no trade balances. Unquestionably a planned middle course between nationalism and internationalism is going to require a reduction of some tariff rates, and why not? We have experimented with protection in the extreme for the past decade, and what has been the result? Tariff wars between nations have resulted in drastic reductions in the volume of world trade, not only in America, but in many other countries. Today we are struggling with an economic crisis, the like of which has never been known. We are exerting every effort, and properly so, to cope with a volume of unemployment that has engulfed the Nation; unemployment and a forced low standard of living that protection for industry was supposed to prevent.

Such a state of affairs has naturally reduced the purchasing power of the American working man, and thus had a disastrous effect upon American agriculture, the basic industry. Men who have no work cannot buy meat and bread.

If our trade channels can be opened, and I think they can, there is reason to believe that the wheels of industry will begin to move again in order to supply the demands created thereby. Men on their way back to work are naturally going to be in a position to buy the products of the American farmer, who will profit from the transaction. There is some question in my mind as to just how far we can proceed with such a plan. I think we may be able to carry it further toward internationalism than is now generally believed possible.

Too often when we talk of foreign trade we think of ships and oceans and things that are far away. We should remember that Canada is our next-door neighbor. We cannot make ourselves an island with only an imaginary line 2,000 miles long between two such great nations. Just beyond the Rio Grande are more of our natural trade allies. Mexico, Central and South America are waiting to buy vast quantities of American goods. We have only scratched the surface of that extensive market. Let it be remembered at this point that the world missed a big chance to prevent the collapse of 1929 when nations refused to march side by side in peace as they had done in war. We are on the verge of a new era now, as we were at the end of the great world struggle of 1914. We must either continue with nationalism and its marked restraints or we must choose to develop our international trade and thereby put millions of unemployed back to work again. We have looked beyond our boundary lines for generations, and I venture to say we must do so in the future if we want to develop the greatest and most powerful nation in the universe.

The American farmer is a producer of surpluses in the field of his major products and therefore will be a leading benefactor.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, during the many hours of general debate upon this bill, we have listened to the usual number of funeral orations pronounced upon the death of the Constitution of the United States and the lamentations of a few gentlemen over the fact that conditions in this country, as well as in the world, have changed since the days of Washington and Jefferson and that we cannot live entirely unto ourselves. We have even heard a few Members from this side of the House speak against this bill. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CARPENTER] said the other day in speaking upon this bill:

I happen to be one of those rare Democrats who believe in a high tariff. I believe this country is going to be self-contained some day.

Thank God such Democrats are rare! I happen to be one of those Democrats who believe in the democratic doctrine of equal opportunities for all and special privileges for none. The high protective tariff is entirely contrary to and subversive of that doctrine. One of the greatest of the American Presidents, a great statesman from my own State, the State of New York, a great American and a great Democrat, Grover Cleveland, speaking during his first administration when the Democratic Party had come into power for the first time since the Civil War and when that great leader was making an effort to secure the passage of a Democratic tariff, a tariff that would carry out the principle of the doctrine of equal rights and equal opportunities for all and the destruction of special privileges for the favored few, and speaking after his noble effort had been to some extent thwarted by the fact that certain Members of the Congress at that time, bearing the label of Democrats, had injected into that tariff bill provisions favoring monopoly, aptly quoted the lines:

Oh, for a tongue to curse the slave
Whose treason, like a deadly blight,
Comes o'er the councils of the brave
To blast them in their hour of might.

I am going to support this bill because I believe that it is the next important step designed to advance us on a road to recovery of our prosperity and to the restoration of our foreign trade. The able and indefatigable Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and several other gentlemen on this side of the House have, I believe, furnished the House with complete information as to the provisions of this bill, the results which it is intended and designed to secure, and the effects which it will bring about. I have read the excellent report of the committee upon this bill as well as the minority views contained therein. I have listened to the arguments advanced by some very able and distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the House who argued that this bill contains an unreasonable and, indeed, unconstitutional delegation of powers to the President. In the brief time which it would be proper for me to take at this time I cannot discuss, nor is it necessary to do so, the question of the constitutionality of the bill. Numerous precedents have been cited showing equally as great delegations of power during many times in our political history by the Congress to the President with respect to the tariff and the reciprocal tariff agreements with the other countries of the world. Many of these relate to times when no such emergency existed as exists today.

I have read the cases cited by the gentlemen who claim that this is unconstitutional, and I cannot find a single precedent by the Supreme Court of the United States which sustains their contention.

Let us therefore consider for a moment the matter of the wisdom, the necessity, of this legislation. In the first place, the Congress has never successfully legislated a fair equitable tariff. It is, in fact, so far as the details of tariff making are concerned, an administrative task, rather than a legislative function. A Tariff Commission was created during the administration of another great Democratic President, the immortal Woodrow Wilson. That Commission was created as a fact-finding body, composed of experts, to secure information as to what rates or duties were necessary for the protection of American labor and the protection of American industry and the protection of the American farmer. Very little use has been made of the Tariff Commission under the three preceding Republican Presidents; but, in general, such tariff changes as have been made have been designed to effectuate the conditions which now obtain so far as the farmer is concerned that he buys his machinery and the other things that he needs for himself and his family in a protected and therefore dear market, while he sells his food products in an unprotected market and for what the big dealers and distributors are willing to give him. In other words, the farmer gets it in the neck both going and coming, on both sides of the neck, and he has never received a single bit of benefit from the so-called "protective tariff." Thank God the American farmer is beginning to get his eyes open. It takes 9 days after a pup is born before the pup first opens his eyes and sees the light of day. And the story is that one novice in dog raising, after waiting several days for the litter of puppies to open their eyes, became impatient and knocked them all in the head. Of course, in death their eyes opened.

Some of us used to think that in order for the farmer to get his eyes opened to the hypocrisy and bunk of the Republican Party, he would have to be treated as the fellow in the story treated his pups.

In 1932 it was apparent that the American farmer had his eyes wide open, and hundreds of thousands of farmers who formerly had followed the Republican Party joined in the election of another great President and leader. They now have confidence in him, and I may say to the gentlemen who have been lamenting about this delegation of power to the President that we have confidence in President Roosevelt and that he wants to restore prosperity to the American farmer as well as to American industry and the American laborer.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House, as well as one or two on this side of the House, have pointed to the fact that our export trade or our exportable surpluses are only about 10 percent of the total amount of our production; but any intelligent business man could tell them that the difference between selling 90 percent of his goods and 100 percent of his goods, or even between selling 95 percent of his goods and 100 percent of his goods, means the difference between doing business at a loss and doing business at a profit.

It is necessary for us gradually to restore our foreign trade; it is necessary to do this, in the present state of economic warfare, of trade war, of tariff walls erected by this country against other countries and by other countries against this country, by making reciprocal trade and tariff agreements. What gentleman here believes that the Congress, or even that other august body on the other side of the Capitol which has been assiduously passing the buck the past few days on veterans' legislation [applause], can alone negotiate effectively a trade and tariff agreement? Business is not done in that way by the nations who are now our competitors; business cannot be done that way by this or any other nation; we retain the power here in Congress, we delegate the administration of the power, we, with respect to certain broad vital policies affecting this Nation and other nations, determine and legislate a policy; we properly empower and direct the President to administer the details of such policy.

It has been done not only by other countries, it has been done by ourselves; it is being done in nearly every one of the several States in the Union with respect to the regulation of other matters. I recall that in my own State of New York it used to be regarded as a purely legislative function to regulate the rates charged for their services by the great utility corporations, and the Legislature of the State of New York, as the legislatures of other States, assumed and exercised the power to prescribe for the city of New York and for other cities and communities the rates which gas companies and electric companies, street railways, intra-State railroads might charge the public for their service and commodities. Such a system did not work; it never could work. The power existed in the legislature, but in the State of New York, under the leadership of Governor Hughes, our present great Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the legislature created the Public Service Commission and delegated to it these administrative powers, and the same thing has been done in most of the other States in the Union.

Some gentlemen on this side of the House—and I may say that I have great respect for them—have indicated that they are fearful lest someone in this administration, particularly the Secretary of Agriculture, would do something to destroy or injure some less efficient or, perhaps, inefficient or uneconomic industry upon which their particular sections were dependent.

Personally, I have enough confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture and I am satisfied—from reading of his testimony in the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means—that even if he had the power he would not injure any industry, even though it were inefficient. He has stated, of course, that he does not believe in further expanding an inefficient or uneconomic industry, and with that statement I am in entire agreement, because to expand an inefficient or uneconomic industry is a tax, an unfair tax, and a tax contrary to the Democratic doctrine opposing special privileges. It is a tax upon all the rest of us. But the Secretary of Agriculture is not going to administer this bill. He may, of course, be called upon by the President for information regarding details, but it is the President of the United States, informed by the Tariff Commission and by the other executive departments, who will administer this bill, and if we Democrats have any confidence in him, knowing as we do that we retain the final power, we will pass this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill because I believe it is in complete harmony with Democratic principles and because I believe it is absolutely necessary as the next step upon the road leading to the economic recovery of the Nation and to prosperity for the American farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL].

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, one cannot choose his birthplace nor his early environment. My parents were Republicans, but they were Lincoln Republicans. As I grew older I began to read and I began to think. May I quote the Good Book, where Saint Paul says in First Corinthians?—

When I was a child I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

So when I became of age I became a Democrat and cast my first vote for William Jennings Bryan. Twelve years later I convinced my good old mother that the Republican Party had so far departed from the ideals and principles of Abraham Lincoln that she cast her first vote for Woodrow Wilson. We had moved to Washington, a woman-suffrage State.

One of the reasons I became a Democrat was the tariff. The tariff has been a century-long issue between the Republicans and the Democrats. Away back during Jackson's time we had the tariff of abominations, and up until today we have had such abominable tariffs as the Payne-Aldrich, the Fordney-McCumber, and the Smoot-Hawley tariff bills. So I became a Democrat because of the tariff issue.

May I call the attention of my Republican colleagues to the origin of the word "tariff"? On the north coast of Africa there is a little place called "Tariffe." From this point pirates would go out when ships passed and would take a toll from those ships because the pirates were the stronger. We have had in this country pirates of industry. Every time a housewife buys an aluminum dish or some aluminumware she pays tribute to these pirates. Every time a farmer buys an implement he pays a tribute to these pirates. Thomas Jefferson tamed the pirates of Tripoli during his administration, and Franklin Roosevelt will tame the pirates of industry during his term. My good friends over on the minority side say that Mellon was the greatest Secretary since Alexander Hamilton. I submit that he is the greatest humbug since P. T. Barnum. P. T. Barnum said there was a fool born every minute, and for years the Republican Party has fooled the American farmer.

Abraham Lincoln once made the statement that "You may fool part of the people all of the time, and all of the people part of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time." The farmers have awakened. They are not going to be fooled any longer by the proponents of high tariff.

I talked with a farmer at Trout Lake, Wash., in 1931. He told me he had purchased a manure spreader and paid $15 more in 1931 for the manure spreader than he paid during the war. What was he getting for the eggs protected by your tariff? He was getting 11 cents. What was he getting for his butter under your protection? He was getting 18 cents. Yet he paid $15 more for his manure spreader than he paid during war time.

I talked with another farmer and he told me he was going to buy a draper for his combine and that he was going to be charged $10 more for this draper than he had paid during the war. His wheat was selling for 30 cents a bushel. You Republicans gave him a 42-cent tariff on his wheat. This is the kind of protection you have been giving to the farmers. A tariff on their surplus products. A tariff of $5 per bushel on wheat would be of no benefit to the wheat grower. He must get rid of his surplus wheat and the Republicans have destroyed the foreign market for this surplus. Republican tariff help the farmer? What did the farmers think of the Payne-Aldrich bill which President Taft declared to be so beneficial to the farmer? He was the worst defeated man in 1912 of any in American history. What did the voters do to Fordney and McCumber, Smoot and Hawley, and President Hoover who signed the latter tariff bill?

Let us consider the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. One thousand economists of this country urged Hoover to veto that bill. Thirty-eight countries of the world said they would retaliate if we passed it. Yet they went on and passed the bill and the President signed it, and what was the result? It was a game two could play at—all countries could play at. And how they have played the game!

The fruit industry of our Yakima Valley has been destroyed. We used to send hundreds of cars of soft fruit up into Canada. Today our soft fruit, including peaches, apricots, and so forth, is rotting on the ground because of your tariff and because of the retaliation of other countries. From Walla Walla we used to send 200 to 300 cars of vegetables into Canada. We are now sending about 10.

The tariff in Canada on a car of fruit is $1,035, and this is what you brought about by your tariff through retaliation of other countries.

Let me read from a letter I have received from a man in Walla Walla, who states:

Rhubarb, which is produced at this time of the year by forcing with warm artesian water, is selling for only 2½ cents a pound. This is the lowest early price yet. Green onions, about five eighths of an inch in diameter, 9 to the bunch, 15 cents a dozen bunches, or approximately 108 onions. The growers here are sure discouraged and they are wondering what is to become of them, with the beginning prices as low as they are now. The people here formerly shipped large shipments of vegetables to Canada, but the market is closed now on account of the high tariff. If that market could be opened, it would sure be a blessing to this section.

Protection for the farmer! The farmers in my district in 1932 waked up and they helped elect President Franklin Delano Roosevelt. They sent the first Democrat in the history of our district to this Congress, and they are going to stay awake.

Let me quote from the leading Republican daily in my district, the Yakima Morning Herald:

HOW CONGRESS LEGISLATES

After the Secretaries of Agriculture, State, and Commerce had urged the House Ways and Means Committee to recommend that the President be granted wider latitude in adjusting the tariff, Representative TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, a member of the committee, turned to them and said: "You are looking at this thing nationally. We Members of Congress have to look at it from the standpoint of the districts we represent."

The Representative from Massachusetts ably summed up in those two sentences the procedure with respect to the tariff since the first act was written into law. Congress does look at tariff schedules from the sectional or State point of view and not from the national point of view. Because it does so, the tariff laws that finally reach the statute books are the result of wire-pulling and log-rolling and convenient trades. Congressman Smith may know very well that a schedule desired by Congressman Brown is not in the national interest but he votes for it because he needs Congressman Brown's help in putting over a tariff item of his own.

Now, how are our tariffs made? This is the way tariff bills have been made and the strong manufacturing sections of the East, of New York and New England, have prevailed. Mr. Grundy, of Pennsylvania, and his group dictated the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley bill and, of course, they discriminated against the farmers of the South and the West.

It is this industrial group, together with the powerful utility group, that made it possible for 504 men in 1929, according to United States Government statistics, to make a net income equal to the gross income of over 2,000,000 farmers—all the cotton and wheat farmers of the United States. This is how the Republican Party in the past 12 years has helped the American farmer.

Now, what do we propose to do in this bill. We propose to utilize two good features of former tariff bills, flexibility and reciprocity. Our President will be authorized to do what all other countries have authorized their leaders to do. They will all sit down together around the international table, confer, discuss, and determine what will be to the best interests of all concerned. I have complete faith in the President in this matter. I trust in his ability and integrity. So do an overwhelming majority of the American people. He will protect our interests in every respect. He declared our economic independence on July 4, 1933. He declared our financial independence a few months later. The leaders of other nations respect and admire our President, and we can rest assured that this game will be played with fairness and justice to all. The avenues of international trade will be reopened and our surplus products will be transported over them. New markets in the Orient will be established and the markets of Canada, Central and South America be restored to us through the friendly guidance of Secretary Hull and President Roosevelt.

We may not agree with the President on everything. He has stated that he respects honest differences of opinions. He has also stated that if he makes a batting average of 75 percent he will consider himself fortunate. Because of his integrity, his faith, his courage, his unfailing cheerful optimism, we love, admire, and will support his major policies. He is the greatest friend the common man has had in the White House since Lincoln. A former Roosevelt said: "This country in the long run will not be a good place for any one of us to live in unless and until it is a good place for all of us to live in." Our Roosevelt is sincerely and earnestly trying to make that dream come true and establish permanently that high ideal. I am heartily with him in these efforts to restore our foreign commerce, and thus bring prosperity to farm and labor, industry and home. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARPENTER].

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, we know out in my district, a great agricultural district, that we have lost the markets for our products and we believe that the high protective policy that this country has been pursuing is responsible for this loss. The figures that have been disclosed in this debate, in the committee report, and in the hearings show that our total exports have fallen from $5,241,000,000 in 1929 to $1,670,000,000 in 1933, and it was brought out when the Dies silver bill was up for consideration that our agricultural exports have fallen from $1,800,000,000 in 1928 to $400,000,000 in 1932. These figures, I believe, therefore, prove that the people in my district are right in their conclusions that the high protective tariff policy is responsible for the decline in our exports.

The tariff was one of the principal issues in my district in the last election, and my people voted for tariff legislation calculated to help them regain their lost trade, and they would feel that they had been betrayed if they do not get it.

In 1927 I was in Paris, France, and became acquainted with a young American World War veteran, who had married a French girl and settled down in Paris. He was engaged in the typewriter business, principally buying and selling American typewriters. While I was there the Government of France entered into a trade agreement with Germany. According to said agreement with Germany, goods were to be let into France duty free, in return for certain French goods being permitted to enter Germany duty free, and at the same time the duty on a great many American products was raised. American manufactured products were popular in France and would outsell the French-made goods, which products consisted of automobiles, typewriters, adding machines, cameras, telephones, fountain pens, and all American standard manufactured goods. At once the American State Department protested. They said, "What does France mean by entering into a favorable trade agreement with a former enemy while at the same time discriminating against an ally?" The French Government retorted, "We will make the same sort of an arrangement or agreement with the United States; if you will let into your country certain French goods duty free or at lower tariff, we will then lower tariff on these goods on which the tariff had been raised and permit certain other American goods to come in duty free." But the State Department again said, "We request France to reduce the tariff on American products, but we cannot lower the tariff on French goods, because Congress alone has the power to do so." While these negotiations were going on, I stopped in my friend's place of business and said, "I expect you are rather provoked with the action of France in regard to the tariff on American goods, are you not? And he replied, "How is that? Haven't we in America always believed that we could have a high tariff if we wanted to?" I said, "Yes"; and he said, "Then why can't France have a high tariff too if she wants one?"

It occurred to me at that time that this high protective tariff policy had worked very well so long as the United States was the only country to maintain a high tariff. Thus we could prevent the products from other countries coming into our country, but there was nothing to restrain us from selling our goods to them. Now, however, the other countries of the world have seen how well it worked in the United States, and they have decided if it worked well for us it would work well for them. It was then that I began to give thought to this matter. It appeared to me we would eventually lose all of our foreign trade and that our products would begin to pile up on us at home, and that would mean that employees in different industrial enterprises would lose their jobs—that this would spread over all the United States, that people would lose their purchasing power, and that our country would be headed toward a depression in due time. Of course, I thought this would not come about immediately, but that it would occur in due time, probably in 25 or 50 years from then: I did not foresee at that time the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. However, not long after that came the Hoover landslide and apparently big business and the great greedy interests who had thrived under the high protective policy in the years gone by were smart enough to realize that the farmers and the laborers and the people in general in this country would soon have the blind removed from their eyes and would demand a reduction of our tariff. According to the old rules of the game always played by the big interests, they then began to follow out their usual tactics in demanding as high a tariff as possible, knowing this would be their last opportunity in this country to ever obtain such a high tariff. They knew we did not need any such high tariff as they were demanding; but if they obtained such a high tariff, when the demand later came for a lower tariff and the tariff rates reduced, the reduction would not hurt them any because they were able to put over the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

When this Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was up before Congress, 1,028 economists, a great many, if not the majority, of whom were college professors, petitioned the Congress not to pass such a bill and if passed that it be vetoed by the President, and they pointed out what would happen to this country should said bill be passed; especially did they predict retaliatory tariffs. I quote from their petition as follows:

The undersigned American economists and teachers of economics strongly urge that any measure which provides for a general upward revision of tariff rates be denied passage by Congress, or if passed, be vetoed by the President.

We are convinced that increased protective duties would be a mistake. * * *

The vast majority of farmers, also, would lose. Their cotton, corn, lard, and wheat are export crops and are sold in the world market. They have no important competition in the home market. They cannot benefit, therefore, from any tariff which is imposed upon the basic commodities which they produce. * * *

Our export trade, in general, would suffer. Countries cannot permanently buy from us unless they are permitted to sell to us, and the more we restrict the importation of goods from them by means of ever higher tariffs the more we reduce the possibility of our exporting to them. This applies to such exporting industries as copper, automobiles, agricultural machinery, typewriters, and the like, fully as much as it does to farming. The difficulties of these industries are likely to be increased still further if we pass a higher tariff. There are already many evidences that such action would inevitably provoke other countries to pay us back in kind by levying retaliatory duties against our goods. * * *

America is now facing the problem of unemployment. Her labor can find work only if her factories can sell their products. Higher tariffs would not promote such sales. We cannot increase employment by restricting trade. American industry, in the present crisis, might well be spared the burden of adjusting itself to new schedules of protective duties.

Everything they predicted would happen in case this bill became a law and more too did occur. There is a lot of criticism today of college professors and a lot of ridicule of the so-called "brain trust." So far as I am personally concerned, I would not turn over the running of this country to the college professors or to any one class, be they lawyers, doctors, or so-called "statesmen"; yet I do want to say that here were some college professors who knew what they were talking about; and, alas! it was not only too bad for Hoover but also for the country that he did not take their advice.

Even before the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was passed and when it was in the process of being passed—it being a good many months under consideration—the other countries of the world viewed with alarm what we were doing, and on the threat of the passage of this bill commenced to erect retaliatory tariffs against us. Then it was that this country and the whole world started the slipping that landed us in this depression. I say, if there was any one group in this country today that is responsible for the legislation requiring governmental control of agricultural surpluses—the N.R.A. and all these other emergency acts—it is this high-tariff crowd that ruined our foreign trade and thereby threw these surpluses back upon us. It is this high-tariff policy which is, in my judgment, the root of all evil in this country from an economic standpoint. It was this tariff policy causing retaliatory tariffs abroad that resulted in our great American industries going to foreign countries and establishing American manufacturing plants to get around these retaliatory tariffs, and where cheap foreign labor could be employed.

Thus these American products manufactured abroad were put in competition with our industries in this country, resulting in the closing of the factories in this country and a throwing of American workmen out of employment. Millions and billions of dollars have been taken out of this country and invested abroad, and to stop such practice I introduced H.R. 5306, now pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, to tax all moneys and credits going out of this country for permanent investment abroad. Had such a law been in effect the last 10 years, not only would it have resulted in this money and capital remaining in this country, where it belongs, but it would also have brought in considerable revenue to the Treasury that was being taken out of this country never to return.

What would happen in any town or city if the merchants and the people in that town or city quit trading with each other? It would mean that the businesses in the city would cease and the city would die. The same thing would happen which has happened to the various countries in the world when they quit trading with each other.

In regard to the legislation provided in this bill, President Roosevelt said in his message to Congress:

Other governments are to an ever-increasing extent winning their share of international trade by negotiated, reciprocal trade agreements. If American agricultural and industrial interests are to retain their deserved place in this trade, the American Government must be in a position to bargain for that place with other governments by rapid and decisive negotiation based upon a carefully considered program, and to grant with discernment corresponding opportunities in the American market for foreign products supplementary to our own.

If the American Government is not in a position to make fair offers for fair opportunities, its trade will be superseded. If it is not in a position at a given moment rapidly to alter the terms on which it is willing to deal with other countries, it cannot adequately protect its trade against discriminations and against bargains injurious to its interests. Furthermore, a promise to which prompt effect cannot be given is not an inducement which can pass current at par in commercial negotiations.

For this reason any smaller degree of authority in the hands of the Executive would be ineffective. The executive branches of virtually all other important trading countries already possess some such power.

If we had had such a law as is here proposed by the President, we could have quickly and promptly negotiated a trade agreement with France back in 1927 on the occasion referred to in the beginning of my speech.

It is the duty of Congress to pass legislation that will benefit the whole country. We are not supposed to be just a debating society with nothing more involved than to try to see who can be victorious in the passing or defeating of some bill. It is not a question of whether the Democrats can defeat the Republicans or the Republicans can defeat or embarrass the Democrats upon the floor of this House. I supposed that the political party was merely the pony that we rode on up to Congress and that when we arrived here we would not ride our horse around on the inside of this Chamber, but would tie him on the outside and get down to the business of our country without regard to partisan politics, but I find to my sorrow that such is not the case.

The opponents of this measure are against the regulation by the Government of agricultural surpluses, and in this I do not disagree with them; but at the same time they say they are opposed to lowering the tariff rates and are opposed to international trade agreements. They want higher and yet higher tariffs. If they are serious in their opposition to the governmental regulation of agricultural surpluses, then they should be opposed to a high tariff; but if they are in favor of a high tariff to prevent our trading with other countries, then they should favor the governmental regulation of our agricultural surpluses. If they oppose one, they must oppose the other; if they are in favor of one proposition, then they must favor the other; they cannot work both sides of the street at the same time.

In my judgment, in considering a tariff bill in which the schedules are all contained therein, Congress is more apt to pass a high tariff bill than a low tariff bill, for the reason that each Member of Congress wants some special protection or a high tariff upon some product from his own district; so, in order to obtain the votes of other Members for his high-tariff schedule, he will vote for a high tariff on their products. The only way we can ever adjust our tariff regulations, so as to permit of trading with other countries, is, therefore, to pass the legislation as proposed in this bill.

The two most important matters of legislation affecting the future economic welfare of this country, in my judgment, are:

First. Tariff legislation that will enable us to resume our trading with the rest of the world; and Second. Legislation that will give us an expansion of the currency wherein we will have an adequate but sound medium of exchange, and I believe this can best come about through remonetization of silver, which will give us a medium of exchange to trade with that part of the world that has only silver with which to purchase our products.

There have been many statements read here by the gentlemen opposed to this bill, quoting distinguished Members of this body, and such being the case, then let me read to you certain statements from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD applicable to conditions of today:

We hear much about a "stable currency" and an "honest dollar." It is a significant fact that those who have spoken in favor of unconditional repeal have for the most part avoided a discussion of the effect of an appreciating standard. They take it for granted that a gold standard is not only an honest standard but the only stable standard. I denounce that child of ignorance and avarice, the gold dollar under a universal gold standard, as the most dishonest dollar which we could employ. * * *

I am on sound and scientific ground, therefore, when I say that a dollar approaches honesty as its purchasing power approaches stability. If I borrow a thousand dollars today and next year pay the debt with a thousand dollars which will secure exactly as much of all things desirable as the one thousand which I borrowed, I have paid in honest dollars. If the money has increased or decreased in purchasing power, I have satisfied my debt with dishonest dollars. While the Government can say that a given weight of gold or silver shall constitute a dollar, and invest that dollar with legal-tender qualities, it cannot fix the purchasing power of the dollar. That must depend upon the law of supply and demand, and it may be well to suggest that this Government never tried to fix the exchangeable value of a dollar until it began to limit the number of dollars coined.

If the number of dollars increases more rapidly than the need for dollars—as it did after the gold discoveries of 1849—the exchangeable value of each dollar will fall and prices rise. If the demand for dollars increases faster than the number of dollars—as it did after 1800—the price of each dollar will rise and prices generally will fall. The relative value of the dollar may be changed by natural causes or by legislation. An increased supply—the demand remaining the same, or a decreased demand, the supply remaining the same—will reduce the exchangeable value of each dollar. Natural causes may act on both supply and demand; as, for instance, by increasing the product from the mines or by increasing the amount consumed in the arts. Legislation acts directly on the demand, and thus affects the price, since the demand is one of the factors in fixing the price.

If by legislative action the demand for silver is destroyed, and the demand for gold is increased by making it the only standard, the exchangeable value of each unit of that standard, or dollar, as we call it, will be increased. If the exchangeable value of the dollar is increased by legislation, the debt of the debtor is increased, to his injury and to the advantage of the creditor. And let me suggest here, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCall], who said that the money lender was entitled to the advantages derived from improved machinery and inventive genius, that he is mistaken. The laboring man and the producer are entitled to these benefits, and the money lender, by every law of justice, ought to be content with a dollar equal in purchasing power to the dollar which he loaned; and anyone desiring more than that desires a dishonest dollar, it matters not what name he may give to it. Take an illustration: John Doe, of Nebraska, has a farm worth $2,000 and mortgages it to Richard Roe, of Massachusetts, for $1,000. Suppose the value of the monetary unit is increased by legislation which creates a greater demand for gold. The debt is increased. If the increase amounts to 100 percent the Nebraska farmer finds that the prices of his products have fallen one half and his land loses one half its value, unless the price is maintained by the increased population incident to a new country.

The mortgage remains nominally the same, though the debt has actually become twice as great. Will he be deceived by the cry of "honest dollar"? If he should loan a Nebraska neighbor a hog weighing 100 pounds and the next spring demand in return a hog weighing 200 pounds he would be called dishonest, even though he contended that he was only demanding one hog—just the number he loaned. Society has become accustomed to some very nice distinctions. The poor man is called a "Socialist" if he believes that the wealth of the rich should be divided among the poor, but the rich man is called a "financier" if he devises a plan by which the pittance of the poor can be converted to his use.

The poor man who takes property by force is called a "thief", but the creditor who can by legislation make a debtor pay a dollar twice as large as he borrowed is lauded as the friend of a sound currency. The man who wants the people to destroy the Government is an anarchist but the man who wants the Government to destroy the people is a patriot.

The great desire now seems to be to restore confidence, and some have an idea that the only way to restore confidence is to coax the money lender to let go of his hoard by making the profits too tempting to be resisted. Capital is represented as a shy and timid maiden who must be courted, if won. Let me suggest a plan for bringing money from Europe. If it be possible, let us enact a law "Whereas confidence must be restored; and whereas money will always come from its hiding place if the inducement is sufficient: Therefore be it enacted, that every man who borrows $1 shall pay back $2 and interest (the usury law not to be enforced)."

Would not English capital come "on the swiftest ocean greyhounds"? The money lender of London would say: "I will not loan in India or in Egypt or in South America. The inhabitants of those countries are a wicked and ungodly people and refuse to pay more than they borrowed. I will loan in the United States, for there lives an honest people, who delight in a sound currency and pay in an honest dollar." Why does not someone propose that plan? Because no one would dare to increase by law the number of dollars which the debtor must pay, and yet by some it is called wise statesmanship to do indirectly and in the dark what no man has the temerity to propose directly and openly.

We have been called cranks and lunatics and idiots because we have warned our fellow men against the inevitable and intolerable consequences which would follow the adoption of a gold standard by all the world. But who, I ask, can be silent in the presence of such impending calamities? The United States, England, France, and Germany own today about $2,600,000,000 of the world's supply of gold coin, or about five sevenths of the total amount, and yet these four nations contain but a small fraction of the inhabitants of the globe. What will be the exchangeable value of a gold dollar when India's people, outnumbering alone the inhabitants of the four great nations named, reach out after their share of gold coin? What will be the final price of gold when all the nations of the Occident and Orient join in the scramble?

This speech that I have just read to you states the conditions that prevail today; and if you ask me what Senator or Representative made that speech yesterday, last week, last month, or last year, I will have to tell you that this speech was made by no other than William Jennings Bryan on this very floor almost 41 years ago, and on August 16, 1893. It is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, No. 133, volume 25, part 1, page 401 and following pages.

Again I read to you:

The farmer labors under a double disadvantage. He not only suffers as a producer from all those causes which reduce the price of property, but he is thrown into competition with the products of India. Without Indian competition his lot would be hard enough, for if he is a landowner he finds his capital decreasing with an appreciating standard, and if he owes on the land he finds his equity of redemption extinguished. The last census shows a real-estate mortgage indebtedness in the five great agricultural States—Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska—of more than $1,000,000,000. A rising standard means a great deal of distress to these mortgagors. But as I said, the producers of wheat and cotton have a special grievance, for the prices of those articles are governed largely by the prices in Liverpool, and as silver goes down our prices fall, while the rupee price remains the same.

It is among the first principles in finance that the value of each dollar, expressed in prices, depends upon the total number of dollars in circulation. The plane of prices is high when the number of dollars in circulation is great in proportion to the number of things to be exchanged by means of dollars, and low when the dollars are proportionately few. The plane of prices at present and for some time past is and has been ruinously low. The increase of our population at about two millions a year, scattered over our immense territory, calls for increasing exchanges, and thereby demands an increasing number of dollars in circulation. The increase in the number of dollars when dollars are confined to gold is not sufficiently rapid to meet the growth of our exchanges. The consequence is a growing value of dollars, or a diminishing value of everything else expressed in dollars; which is to say, a tendency toward constantly declining prices.

The fountainhead of our prosperity has run dry. Our farmers over all the country have endured the depression in prices, until they get about $8 or $9 an acre for an expenditure of $10 per acre, and the like. Their credit is exhausted at their country stores. The country store ceases to order from the city merchant, the city merchant reduces his demand upon the manufacturer. Manufactures are curtailed. The consequence is that employees and all elements of labor are being discharged and wages are lowered to those who continue in employment. The sufferings of the farmers, who constitute nearly one half of our population, are thus enforced upon the city merchant, the manufacturer, and all forms of labor. These combined elements constitute the overwhelming majority of voters. Their intelligent conclusion will be felt when expressed at the polls.

This speech sounds very much like some of the speeches of our colleagues here in Congress or some of the speeches delivered not long ago by our good friend, the late John Simpson, but which is taken from the speech of William P. St. John, Esq., of New York, at the silver-party convention in 1896.

I quote the following resolution:

We are unalterably opposed to the issue by the United States of interest-bearing bonds in time of peace, and we denounce as a blunder worse than a crime the present Treasury policy, concurred in by a Republican House, of plunging the country into debt by hundreds of millions in the vain attempt to maintain the gold standard by borrowing gold; and we demand the payment of all coin obligations of the United States, as provided by existing laws, in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the Government, and not at the option of the creditor.

The demonetization of silver in 1873 enormously increased the demand for gold, enhancing its purchasing power and lowering all prices measured by that standard, and since that unjust and indefensible act the prices of American products have fallen upon an average nearly 50 percent, carrying down with them proportionately the money value of all other forms of property. Such fall of prices has destroyed the profits of legitimate industry, injuring the producer for the benefit of the nonproducer, increasing the burden of the debtor, swelling the gains of the creditor, paralyzing the productive energies of the American people, relegating to idleness vast numbers of willing workers, sending the shadows of despair into the home of the honest toiler, filling the land with tramps and paupers, and building up colossal fortunes at the money centers.

which resolution sounds as if it had been written up by the friends of the farmer and silver legislation, but which was a part of the silver-party platform of 1896.

Therefore, it is now clearly seen that those advocating a tariff policy that would permit foreign trade in our agricultural products and other products and advocating the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a fixed ratio 40 years ago were right, and those who favored high tariffs and opposed silver legislation eventually brought us where we are today.

The amount of wealth in this country increased from $186,300,000,000 in 1912 to $399,900,000,000 in 1923, and in 1929 it stood at $361,800,000,000, whereas the total amount of gold produced in the United States from 1790 to May 2, 1933, is placed at approximately 226,384,295 ounces, with a value of $4,679,778,700, therefore approximately in 1923 we had 400 billions of wealth in this country, all of which wealth was measured on a gold basis with approximately only four billion dollars of actual gold as a medium of exchange with which to move this great volume of business, and which when the demand was made for the gold would therefore cause one of two actions, either the $4,000,000,000 worth of gold had to be increased toward the $400,000,000,000 worth of property value or the four hundred billions of property value had to be deflated down to the four billions of actual gold. There being no more gold in existence, therefore, values had to fall and consequently our national wealth was decreased while the indebtedness remained where it was. While no one expects that we will have as much gold in existence as we have national wealth, the point is that it is very foolish to remain on a gold basis and to depend upon gold and gold alone as our medium of exchange; and if we do so, our wealth being so much greater than the gold in this country and increasing at a greater ratio, then it can only result in stagnation of trade. Instead of the medium of exchange controlling the wealth, the wealth of the country should control the medium of exchange; in other words, instead of the tail wagging the dog, the dog should wag the tail. It may be that the medium of exchange in ordinary transactions of business, of course, would not have to be of such a great volume, but it has been manifested that this amount of gold has been altogether too small and, therefore, if we should broaden our base and remonetize silver and issue a certain amount of currency instead of tax-exempt bonds, such action would thereby increase our medium of exchange sufficiently to lubricate our business and keep the channels of trade moving.

Most all forms of expansion of the currency are denounced by those opposing expansion as fiat money. How have we been transacting business here prior to the debacle of March 1933? I should judge over 90 percent by the medium of exchange was in the form of notes, bank checks, and drafts, which did not even have the fiat of the Government behind them, and were nothing but paper money. While the Government now has more gold stored up in the Treasury than it has paper money outstanding, yet what kind of currency do we have in this country today? Primarily it is backed by gold, but practically, since the payment in gold is suspended and we are prohibited from possessing it or gold certificates, all we have behind this paper money is the credit of the Nation. Silver, except to a limited degree, is not recognized; and yet we are warned of all things to beware of printing-press money, and lo! that is all we have. We have just as much paper money as someone in the Treasury says we shall have; and yet the Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall be the one to determine this. Just let Congress attempt to determine how much currency we should have and hear the experts begin to howl and tell us that Congress is attempting to ruin the country.

The course we have been following in regard to our currency is a course that has been controlled by those who believe in a high protective tariff and the building of this tariff higher and still higher. They tell us that whatever expansion we have must be an expansion of credit, but not an expansion of the currency. In my judgment the motive behind the actions in regard to the currency policy this country is now pursuing and has been pursuing these many years is to give the big bankers and the moneyed powers of this country and abroad the advantage by creating an expansion of the credit upon which interest can be collected, whereas no interest can be collected upon currency. In other words, these great banks and moneyed powers will have control of the money, and hence the wealth of this country and at the same time compel every one else to pay them tribute in the form of interest, and therefore they will be our real masters.

With every other country having erected a high-tariff wall and refusing to let our goods in, perhaps we cannot all at once reduce our tariff and proceed on a basis of free trade and revenue only. However, if we did so, I believe we have no need to fear because American products are so much better than European products that they can outsell them even in their own countries; but for fear there would be a flood of cheap products in our country while our goods would be prohibited from selling abroad, the safest way to proceed is with trade agreements as provided in this bill.

This tariff power must be intrusted to someone. Some governmental agency will of necessity have to control, no difference what kind of a tariff bill Congress might pass; therefore, why not trust the President of the United States as a servant of Congress and the people of the United States in this regard? The President of the United States can be removed every 4 years and can be removed so much easier than the influence of big business that surrounds a Congress when tariff legislation is being considered.

Before I conclude let me read an editorial that appeared in the Kansas City Star sometime ago, entitled "The Tariff Factor in Trade" bearing upon this legislation and which reads as follows:

Discussion of the world's high tariffs, as a factor against trade revival persists. It is becoming more and more obvious, and therefore more and more accepted, that American import duties in many instances are too high, even from the protective point of view. There is much to the contention of Prof. Harry D. Gidionse, of the University of Chicago, in an address in this city, that a tariff policy serviceable to the United States when it was a debtor nation is not serviceable since we have become a creditor nation.

This country cannot expect to receive payments in gold on its foreign debts, public and private, and on goods which it sells abroad. It has been impressively demonstrated in the last year that there is not enough gold for that purpose. Payments must be accepted largely in goods if we are to continue to sell surplus products abroad. It is precisely such payment that a high tariff prevents.

The high-tariff policies in Europe are chiefly due to the outburst of nationalism evoked by the war and the desire of every nation, no matter how small, to make itself as nearly as possible self-sufficient, even at heavy expense to its people. The responsibility of the present American tariff rates for European tariffs is overstated, but in some instances retaliatory action was taken.

There is little prospect of early changes in world tariffs. Last year the European conference to obtain a standstill arrangement on tariffs broke down. The protected industries had enough political power to prevent action. It is possible that severe economic pressure may lead to a general mitigation of the high duties that are stifling European trade.

In the United States the pressure of public opinion ought to be exercised to obtain reciprocal arrangements under which American duties might be reduced in return for reduction in foreign schedules. But with a national election in prospect it is probably impossible to obtain the necessary legislation. The influence of protected industries is so strong that Congress feels any proposal of tariff changes would be full of political dynamite.

While I believe it to be the duty of every Representative in Congress to vote as he conscientiously believes for the best interests of his constituents, and I have no criticism of any Member of Congress for honestly voting in any way in which his judgment and his conscience dictates in the interest of the people of his district, his State, and this Nation, yet I have heard a great deal of hullabaloo of voting for and supporting the President on a lot of measures some of which were important and some of which were not important, some of which are good and some of which are not so good, but, in my judgment, here is a real test of whether a Member of Congress is not only voting for President Roosevelt but for the people of this country and therefore I am voting for this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SEGER].

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, evidently there are some who do not agree with the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson] that no industry will be put out of business by the enactment of this legislation.

I have just received a telegram from the secretary of the code authority for the lace-manufacturing industry, which I am going to read because it also affects many of my constituents.

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 27, 1934.

Congressman GEORGE N. SEGER,

House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Secretary Wallace cites lace industry as inefficient and offers our industrial head on executioner's block as sacrifice in the effort to secure the reciprocal trade agreement proposed in bill before House. The wiping out of more than $20,000,000 of invested capital and the throwing out of employment of more than 8,000 people in our industry is the generous offer of Secretary Wallace. Complete destruction of industrial effort covering more than 20 years' work is promised by those officials to whom American industry should look for encouragement and support. The passage of the amendment to the Tariff Act of 1930 would spell complete disaster and ruin to an industry which was established in this country by Government invitation and encouragement. Our industry is today operating under the sixth code promulgated by the National Industrial Recovery Administration. Our operating costs, due to patriotic support of N.R.A., have been greatly increased to the advantage of industrial Europe, which is not operating under N.R.A. Is our loyal support of President Roosevelt's recovery program to be rewarded by annihilation as a reciprocal gesture to Europe. Are our 8,000 employees to be thrown out of employment and our capital investment to be dissipated in the hope of developing export trade without American industry being given even an opportunity to be heard? We earnestly appeal to you to use your best efforts to defeat this un-American measure. Incidentally, we greatly resent Secretary Wallace's characterization of the lace industry as "inefficient." We challenge this statement by asserting that the lace industry in America as organized today is vastly more efficient than the industry abroad, despite the hundreds of years of European historic background.

CLEMENT J. DRISCOLL,

Secretary of Code Authority for Lace Manufacturing Industry.

Mr. Chairman, I ask at this time unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD three other telegrams which I have received and a short brief which I have prepared with respect to various tariff acts.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PARSONS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., March 28, 1934.

HON. GEORGE N. SEGER,

House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Lace industry is opposed to any change to Tariff Act of 1930; especially denounces attempt to give President power to bargain away our protection through reciprocal tariff negotiations. Should duties on laces be reduced, an annual pay roll of $10,000,000 will be wiped out in the United States, to be replaced by pay rolls in foreign countries amounting to less than one sixth of this amount. These lace makers in foreign countries will have only limited purchasing power. Our workers buy more American-made products in our home markets than the whole lace industries of Europe combined. American lace industry is more efficient than any in the world. Contrary to Secretary Wallace's statement, our lace industry is the most efficient in the world.

H. A. PHILIPS,

General Manager the American Fabrics Co., Bridgeport, Conn.

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 28, 1934.

Congressman GEORGE N. SEGER,

Washington, D.C.:

Protesting in the name of the hand machine embroidery industry, representing 350 factories, 90 percent of which are in your State, against the bill known as H.R. 8687.

SIGMUND WEITZEN,

Chairman of the Code Authority Board of Administration.

NEW YORK, N.Y., March 28, 1934.

GEORGE N. SEGER,

House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

We strongly oppose passage of H.R. 8687. It is obvious from newspaper reports and from statement of the executive commercial policy committee that if this bill is made law the powers granted the President will be used to destroy industries without proper consideration of facts. The lace-manufacturing industry has been cited as overprotected and inefficient. We deny it and are prepared to prove that the lace-manufacturing industry in this country is conducted more efficiently than anywhere in the world. To grant the President powers provided for in the bill would be un-American and contrary to all the principles of N.R.A.

LIBERTY LACE AND NETTING WORKS,
106 West Thirty-eighth Street.

HUGO N. SCHLOSS, Treasurer.

IMPORTANCE OF TARIFF PROTECTION TO THE LACE INDUSTRY

Mr. SEGER. From the time of the Tariff Act of 1890 to 1909, with the exception of the years from 1894 to 1897, the duty on lace edgings, embroideries, insertions, and the like was 60 percent ad valorem. In 1909 Congress encouraged the lace industry by raising the duty on all products of the Levers lace machine to 70 percent ad valorem and at the same time allowed the importation of Lever machines free of duty for a period of 17 months (normally there was a 45-percent duty on machines.)

This encouragement to the industry apparently came as a surprise to many of the lace and lace-curtain manufacturers in this country. By January 1, 1911, over $20,000,000 was invested in the establishment of the industry. Mills were started in eight States and direct employment given to many thousands of persons. There was great difficulty in getting skilled weavers to run the machines. The industry had difficult technical problems. There was besides keen competition from foreign producers. The new factories were just about in working order when the rates on Levers lace goods were reduced by the Tariff Act of 1913. This came as a bitter blow to the industry. One manufacturer stated at the tariff hearings in 1921:

We believed that it was the intent of Congress to encourage the creation of a distinctive American industry and that it would not hastily revise a decision made on its own initiative. The act of Congress therefore in 1913 in reducing the tariff to 60 percent was a keen disappointment to many who had started in the new industry.

During the World War the lace machines of America were shown to be potential arms of national defense in that they produced bobbinet or what is commonly known as "mosquito netting" and other material required by the Army and Navy. Practically all of the lace machines were operating on Government contracts for much-needed material in the program of national defense.

At the close of the war the growth of the hand-made lace industry in the Orient with its low labor costs made it possible to market hand-made laces, in this and other countries, at low prices in competition with the higher grades of machine-made lace. This competition led the domestic manufacturers to ask for greater protection and in the Tariff Act of 1922 the rate on Levers products was raised to 90 percent ad valorem, which rate was again established in 1930, after the most intensive investigation by the Tariff Commission.

With the encouraging of the industry and the higher living costs in America a survey of the wages paid today will show a greater differential between the wages paid in America and those paid abroad.

In this connection it is also well to remember that all our lace mills are maintained and operated in accordance with our well-established factory laws, while the manufacture of laces abroad is in a large measure home work and in mills not operating under the same expensive regulations as apply to mills in this country.

The lace industry is interconnected closely with the yarn industry, as well as the dyeing and bleaching industry.

In reviewing the economic conditions of maintaining this industry in America, consideration must be given to the moneys expended in the purchase of its raw materials such as yarn, dyestuffs, and other accessories.

Its production is consumed by the dress and underwear manufacturing industries. It must be obvious that if laces and lace-trimmed garments did not receive an adequate tariff protection, these garments would be manufactured in foreign countries and imported into this country in large quantities, throwing out of employment the greater part of approximately 187,500 wage earners now engaged in the manufacture of women's lace-trimmed dresses, lace-trimmed underwear, lace-trimmed nightwear, lace-trimmed neckwear, millinery, and so forth, in addition to the thousands of employees directly engaged in the lace industry.

During the tariff hearing of 1921 when the Ways and Means Committee was considering the lace schedule, Vice President Garner, then a member of that committee, made the following statement concerning the lace schedule:

Undoubtedly the statistics in this instance would show that it would stand, from a revenue standpoint, a considerably larger rate than it has now, and I presume equally as large from a protection standpoint.

Mr. Chairman, while the lace industry in this country may not be very profitable, it is far from inefficient. If it were not for the skill of the operators in this industry, it could not compete with the lace makers of foreign countries. Let me give you an example.

Very few people visit Italy without going to Venice, and very few people visit Venice without going to the lace factories, and few women leave the lace factories without buying some lace. I visited a lace factory in Venice with Mrs. Seger and in looking over the work we saw some very beautiful pieces of lace, among them a very fine lace collar which Mrs. Seger appraised at $25 or $30 in the United States. When we asked the price of the man in charge of the store he told us that the collar was worth 200 lire, which is $10 in American money. I asked him how they could produce them so cheaply, and he invited us to go through the factory. In this factory were girls and women of ages ranging almost from the cradle to the grave. The younger group were learners and were receiving 4 or 5 lire a day, or 25 cents. Then we went into the next room and we found the mothers of these girls. They were very expert and were perhaps the best in the factory and were receiving 15 to 18 lire a day, or 90 cents. Then we saw the older women, and I naturally supposed they were very expert, and we were told they were in the past but they had devoted practically all their lives to lace making and such close application had badly injured their eyes and they were no longer very proficient, and they were paid from 6 to 10 lire a day, or 50 cents as a maximum.

How does Mr. Wallace expect to keep up the standard of the workers in industry in this country if the tariff is to be reduced, as could be done under this bill, without the advice of the Tariff Commission, or the consent of Congress?

I think there is more need today than ever for the advice of practical men who can study the facts and present them to the President, rather than trying out experiments of theorists and college professors. Manufacturers will hesitate to enlarge their plants or put in new machinery, not knowing when and if they are to be closed as inefficient and put out of business by foreign competition, which would be the result if this bill is enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the paramount object at the present time is to build for national recovery. The pending proposal to give the President authority to conclude tariff treaties with foreign countries without the consent of the Senate is hardly in this direction. Instead of aiding in the recovery eagerly sought by all, it will, through the creation of uncertainty, delay the return to better days. No industry in this country will be safe if this measure passes from the threat of the loss of the home market, the richest market in the whole world.

No enterprise is going to expand if the owner must always keep an eagle eye on Washington, never knowing at what moment, like a bolt of lightning out of the clear, he will find a treaty consummated which would mean the complete collapse of his industry. Everybody knows the slowing up of business which comes every time Congress revises the tariff. The slowing up would be infinitely greater if there is danger of a revision without warning or even an opportunity to voice protest.

The argument advanced for the legislation is that it will mean a larger volume of foreign trade. No one will quarrel with that worthy purpose. Every nation in the world seeks the same thing. I do not believe this legislation will be successful. The proposed effort will be a delusion and a snare.

It will be a delusion because we will not greatly increase our exports. We may conclude treaties with certain countries which will change the current of trade. We may buy more from that country and we may sell them more, but it will be either at the expense of some other country or our home industries. Foreign trade rises and falls as the purchasing power of a country ebbs and flows. That has been demonstrated during these depression years. Our imports have declined proportionately as our exports.

It will be a snare because it will entrap us into agreements which will stand for years, no matter how harshly the treaty may bear down on any industry. If a rate is fixed by Congress or promulgated by the Tariff Commission, it can be readily changed. But when two countries enter into a treaty it will not be subject to change during the length of the agreement.

It has been aptly said in the past the American people never lost a war or ever won a conference. I am afraid that record will be maintained if we go out seeking trade agreements. I fear Uncle Sam will come back from the conference with about as many clothes as would be needed for life in a nudist colony. The clever, wily diplomats of the Old World may have changed their habits, but I am a bit skeptical. They give little but they always demand much.

The advocates of this legislation frankly admit—to sell more abroad, we must increase our purchases. This in itself is an admission the volume of trade in dollars and cents will not be materially increased. It means some products will enjoy a greater market abroad while foreign imports in other commodities will be greatly increased. Then imports will replace home manufacture.

The increased exports will be chiefly in raw cotton. This is not disputed. Other exports will not experience any great stimulant. The advocates of the legislation frankly say the imports will be at the expense of inefficient industries. The determination of these industries must be more or less a personal one.

In the hearings before the committee, a number of industries such as fine textiles, lace, toys, surgical instruments were mentioned as in the class of inefficiency because they could be manufactured more cheaply abroad. It was further stated there were a hundred more industries in the same classification.

Frankly, there is not an industry in this country, unless it be the steel industry, the automobile industry, or some highly specialized industry, but would be in danger. All pay higher wages than their foreign competitors and consequently all have higher costs. If this is the yardstick to determine an efficient industry, there are going to be many heartaches throughout the country and millions of men and women are going to be thrown out of employment.

The cotton-goods manufacturer, the jeweler, the shoemaker, the silversmith, the woolen manufacturer would all come under scrutiny because every one of these industries finds it impossible to exist without a tariff to hold back the flood of imports from Japan and Czechoslovakia, and other countries.

Theorists with a passion for experiments sitting in their comfortable offices might easily, if so determined, classify any industry as economically unsound, and consequently be the basis for increasing our raw cotton export trade. The fact that these industries have been the means of providing the livelihood of countless thousands for generations would be of no avail. The fact that entire communities were dependent for their existence upon the industry might easily be passed over. The planners, dreaming of a new order, might casually decide these people must be sacrificed for the general good, and they would be given transportation and sent to some other part of the country to start life anew.

I can readily visualize a treaty where England would buy more raw cotton from America in exchange for a wider market for finished cotton goods in the United States. An arrangement could be made—indeed, it has already been suggested—that France would listen to an arrangement whereby she could send more lace and finer textiles to this country. Czechoslovakia would be delighted, I am sure, to increase raw-cotton imports if she could send here textiles, shoes, jewelry, and plate glass. Germany and Japan would eagerly grasp the opportunity to buy raw materials needed anyway to send toys, instruments, electric-light bulbs, and numerous small manufactured articles which even now flood our markets.

It may be said we are unduly alarmed. Perhaps we are, but we have every reason to be alarmed from the statements already made before the Ways and Means Committee. These intimations have had a way recently of becoming real.

Many of these small industries are scattered through New England. They give employment in the aggregate to many thousands of men and women. These industries have contributed to the wealth of the country and their employees have been the backbone of the Nation, a strong underlying force in every emergency.

I believe I know the needs of these industries and the working people of my section better than any of these so-called "experts." I believe I can best serve their interests by refusing to place them in peril, as they would be through the passage of this legislation.

Trade off these many thousands of workers and you may as a result sell a trifle more cotton abroad. But you will swell the ranks of the unemployed and swell the relief bill of the Nation. Trade off these workers and you destroy purchasing power at home—purchasing power which contributes to the prosperity of the cotton grower, the automobile manufacturer, and the western farmer, a market more permanent and more satisfactory to you than any you will win abroad. You will possibly win some trade abroad, but you will eventually close a larger market at home.

In seeking the mirage of increased foreign trade let us not forget that our total foreign trade, both imports and exports, in the aggregate totals less than 10 percent of our trade. The exports which we would stimulate are only about 4 percent of the volume and for the most part are commodities which the foreign countries must buy because they can buy here to the best advantage.

Let us be careful we do not destroy the golden home market in our zeal for markets abroad.

If there are any reciprocal treaties which can be of benefit to the United States, they can be made under present conditions. Let them be made, but bring them back to the Senate for review. If they are for our welfare, they will not suffer from the searchlight of examination. If they cannot stand the test of scrutiny, they should be rejected.

There is no need for haste. No emergency exists, otherwise this bill would not have been delayed over a year before being presented. The Tariff Commission possesses elasticity in revising rates, and under the N.R.A. the President has great tariff powers.

Good judgment should prompt us at this time to refrain from a new policy which obviously will help little, and through the uncertainty which it creates will delay recovery.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has read one of the comforting things that Mr. Wallace suggested, that we might receive Federal aid while we were being liquidated?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I read that, but I am sure our people do not want to risk that. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON].

(Mr. THURSTON had leave to revise and extend his remarks and include therein three tables prepared by the Department of Labor.)

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the pending bill has been somewhat extended, but a great amount of valuable information has been offered which will prove of value to both the Members of the Congress and to the public.

However, it was only natural that a considerable part of the discussion should be based upon conclusions rather than facts. So it will be my purpose to mainly deal with known wage levels, rather than the general aspects of the subject matter, so I want to emphasize the importance of giving consideration to the present wage levels in the United States and in some of the principal European nations.

Recently, I requested the United States Department of Labor to compile information as to the wages being paid in certain lines of endeavor in the United States, and in France, Germany, Great Britain, and Italy, and I will have these tables set out in the RECORD to amplify my remarks upon the subject.

First, I desire to direct your attention to the matter set out in table 1, "Wages paid to agricultural workers in the United States and foreign countries in 1932", and you will note that the average wage paid for first-class ordinary laborers in Czechoslovakia is 18.6 cents per day; that in France the wage per day is about 80 cents to 90 cents, and women are employed in the same country for about 60 cents per day. In Germany, the wage for the ordinary male laborer runs about 8 cents or 9 cents per hour; while in Italy the wage per hour amounts to about 7 cents for men and 2½ cents to 5 cents per hour for women.

The farm wage per day in the United States, in 1932, was found to be about 89 cents, or $1.23 if board was included. This wage is abnormally low, and is hardly a fair basis for computation, but these figures are included in the table and so reference is made thereto.

Table 2 contains statistics showing the wages per hour of adult male workers in the building trades in the month of October 1932, and comparable figures are given for the European cities of Paris, Berlin, London, and Rome, and a table is included showing wages paid in the same trades in New York and Philadelphia. This table is particularly interesting because it shows that the wages paid in several lines of skilled endeavor have a wide variation, and in most instances the laborers in the American cities are paid from two to six times as much per hour as the wages paid to persons doing the same class of service in the four European cities mentioned.

Table 3 is a compilation of the earnings in various trades in respective localities in the United States and foreign countries for the year 1931, or the latest available data in this respect. Again it will be noted that the wages paid to skilled laborers, which include bricklayers, carpenters, and painters, show the wages paid in the United States to be from two to six times the wages paid for like service in Europe.

In the coal-mining industry the average daily wage in the United States appears to be $4.90, or more than twice the wage paid in any European country for this hazardous work.

The tables showing the wages paid for labor in China and India further emphasizes the vast differences that exist in the wage levels as between the United States and those Asiatic countries.

If an exhaustive examination were to be made in all lines of human endeavor throughout the world and tables prepared showing labor costs, a mass of statistical matter would be required to explain the details necessary to present an accurate picture of the compensation paid for every character of service. So it would be impractical to make an exhaustive report upon this subject; but I believe that the three tables set out as a part of my remarks will present a concise yet clear picture of the situation and satisfactorily serve the purpose.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. I yield.

Mr. FOSS. Can the gentleman furnish us with the hours of labor in this country and those in other countries?

Mr. THURSTON. I do not think the tables indicate the number of hours per day.

Mr. FOSS. The hours that they labor in foreign countries are more than they are in this country, are they not?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes.

Having in mind the great difference in the wage levels in the foreign countries as compared with our own, should not labor, as well as the employer of labor, be entitled to reasonable notice of a contemplated change as is now granted in the present tariff law? "Due notice" is a rule of action that has been indelibly written into the fabric of both personal and property rights in our country.

It is apparent that if we are to make reciprocal exchanges with other nations of the world, at all times we must have in our minds the differences in the cost of labor here and abroad and the cost of the raw article which has been enhanced in value by cheap labor.

While we are dealing with the low-wage levels of the rest of the world we should not overlook the fact that the cost of cargo or freight transportation by water has diminished from 20 to 25 percent in the last 5 years. It is also well known that the maritime nations of the world have greatly increased their ocean-going tonnage, and that a considerable portion of these ships are not being operated at this time, so we may assume that ocean freight rates will not increase and are more likely to be reduced.

As distinguished from the reduction in sea-borne commerce, freight rates in the United States have not been reduced in recent years; and, in fact, during the last 15 years have been considerably increased. So that the interior sections of the country are at a very great disadvantage in bringing their products to the eastern seaboard or the consuming section of the country.

Today practically any article of commerce can be shipped from Australia, or Central or South America, to a port on our Atlantic seaboard for a lesser charge than a like article can be transported from the State of Iowa, in the center of the Upper Mississippi Valley, to an Atlantic port. This rate barrier may not properly be called a tariff, but it is a charge that must be added to the selling price of agricultural products.

The duties under the existing tariff act have been reduced 40 percent on account of the revaluation of the American dollar, so when we consider existing facts as distinguished from conclusions, and know that the wage levels in other countries are from 50 to 90 percent lower than the wages paid in our own country, and that the lowest ocean freight rates of modern times are now in effect, plus the diminished value of our own dollar, we are all perplexed to know how we can limit or hold down the importation of the industrial and agricultural products from these cheap-land—cheap-labor countries.

To divert from facts and to enter the field of conclusions, it seems to me, that if the owner of an industry knew that he might be further subjected to foreign competition in the products turned out by his own concern, prudence would require operation on a basis of immediate sales, rather than building up a surplus of finished articles during the low-demand period, and that employment would be more intermittent and less continuous than heretofore.

Then the question should be: Is the possibility of effecting some desirable reciprocal arrangement affecting a few or a limited number of commodities, of more value to our economic structure than this uncertain proposal?

Because of the great concentration of power in the Executive branch of the Government, it would appear that already the person who is called upon to fill this responsible position has a great multiplicity of duties, and exceedingly important duties, that should not be further increased or extended by the enactment of the pending measure. [Applause.]

The matter referred to above is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS,
Washington, March 5, 1934.

HON. LLOYD THURSTON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN THURSTON: With reference to your request made by telephone for statistics of wages paid, particularly in agriculture and the building trades, in the United States, Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, and Italy, I am enclosing herewith tables and certain issues of the Monthly Labor Review.

Table 1 brings together statistics of wages paid to agricultural workers in the above-mentioned countries for 1932, with the exception of Greece, for which no figures are available. The figures shown have been taken from official sources and have previously been published in the Monthly Labor Review.

Table 2 shows hourly wages of adult male workers in the building trades by cities for 4 of the foreign countries mentioned and for 2 cities in the United States. This material likewise comes from official sources and has been collected by the International Labor Office.

As you know, the Bureau of Labor Statistics makes periodic surveys of wages in the United States and collects and publishes information as to wages in foreign countries. Practically all issues of the Monthly Labor Review include the results of wage studies, of which the following (being sent under separate cover) may be useful to you, as they contain comprehensive wage material covering the foreign countries for which you seek information and the results of recent studies for the United States:

MONTHLY LABOR REVIEW, 1933

September: Wages in Germany in 1933 (pp. 686-708).

July: Summary of wage surveys of Bureau of Labor Statistics, 1928 to 1932 (pp. 140-143).

June: General survey of wages in Italy, 1932 (pp. 1395-1411).

April: General trends in wages in Great Britain since 1924 (pp. 871-907).

March: Wages in France in 1932 (pp. 624-643).

February 1932: General survey of wages in Czechoslovakia (pp. 374-392).

Since wage reports for different countries vary so often as regards the unit of payment (hourly, weekly, piece, time, etc.) and also as to occupational names and classifications, deductions for social insurance, and additions, such as family allowances, the possibility of direct international comparison is limited. The results of a comparison of this kind are shown in table 3, enclosed.

Very truly yours,

ISADOR LUBIN,
Commissioner of Labor Statistics.

Enclosure.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts there is embodied a provision reading as follows:

In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

"A government of laws and not of men"—the guaranty and the safeguard of democracy.

During the past year we have witnessed the hasty enactment of measure after measure, departing from this principle of democratic government—measure after measure leading away from a government of laws in the direction of a government of men.

The bill under consideration is a further example of legislation of this character, a further example of a sweeping delegation of legislative power to the Executive—power which the forefathers entrusted to the legislative branch of the Government and never intended to be exercised by the Executive.

Despite the fact that the Federal Constitution expressly provides that Congress shall have the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises", the bill under consideration would delegate this power to the Executive with respect to tariff duties with almost no limitation upon the exercise of Executive discretion within the authorized 50-percent variation.

Despite the fact that the Constitution expressly provides for the submission to the Senate of all treaties with foreign governments, no treaty becoming effective in the absence of ratification by the Senate, the bill under consideration would authorize the Executive without such ratification not only to negotiate but to conclude trade agreements with foreign nations carrying with them the most profound consequences for American industry and American labor with no advance information whatsoever as to their character or content, with no opportunity whatsoever for a day in court for those who may be adversely affected.

The request for this legislation has been characterized as "casually asking Congress for power personally to negotiate and conclude tariff treaties without their submission to the Senate for ratification; without recommendation or guidance by the Tariff Commission; without check from any quarter; without the concurrence of any other person or official body; without revealed method or proven principle or established precedent or even thorough survey of the facts."

The proposed legislation is open to objection on constitutional grounds. It goes far beyond the requirements for reasonable flexibility. It carries with it the possibility of grave consequences for American industry and American labor.

Enactment of the bill in its present form will place the power of life and death with respect to many an industry in the hands of a single individual. It will carry with it for the workers of the Nation the possibility of all the dangers inherent in the displacement of American products by products manufactured abroad under reduced labor costs and reduced standards of living. It will, in my judgment, contribute materially to the underlying uncertainty which is serving to retard national recovery.

For some time past industry has suffered by reason of fundamental elements of uncertainty—uncertainty as to costs of production under the licensing power of the National Recovery Act; uncertainty as to the value of the dollar under the reservation of the right to vary that value to the extent of 16½ percent under the monetary bill. These are but examples of elements of uncertainty, serving, in my judgment, to deny to industry the full benefit of forces of recuperation which have been endeavoring to assert themselves throughout the world for over a year and a half. Recovery, in my judgment, is impossible in the absence of industry free from uncertainty and undue restriction—in the absence of industry given a sound basis for confident action.

The entire weight of the administration has been thrown behind a policy involving inevitably increasing costs of production. Any general tariff revision downward seems utterly inconsistent with that policy. The administration has reserved to itself the right to change the value of the dollar overnight to the extent of 16½ percent. Any general tariff revision on a scientific basis seems out of the question in the light of that reservation.

I cannot conscientiously vote for the bill in its present form. I cannot vote to expose the industries and workers whom it is my privilege to represent to the possible dangers inherent in its terms. I cannot vote for complete abdication of powers with respect to taxation of powers with respect to treaty making which the forefathers in the interest of the Nation intrusted to the legislative branch of this Government. I cannot vote for this further step away from a government of laws in the direction of a government of men. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have not been in the habit of taking up the time of the House or filling the pages of the RECORD with my views on pending legislation. My opinions for the most part have been expressed in monosyllables, either "aye" or "no", and for the past year I have generally said, "no." The only effective thing I can say on the present bill will be my "no" when the roll is called. The measure before us is of such vital importance to the district I represent I am impelled to make a few remarks, even if it is to empty benches.

The people of the city in which I live and in the surrounding farming territory are dependent for existence almost entirely upon factory pay rolls. When the factories are busy many thousands of men and women employees are happy. They have money to spend for food and clothing and rent. Our own merchants, farmers, and landlords prosper, and our purchasing power benefits and stimulates business everywhere in the United States. Most of those industries have been built up under the protection of tariffs and cannot exist without tariffs.

I assume that our local manufacturers of furniture, steel, clothing, shoes, chemicals, candles, cutlery, and hundreds of other articles are inefficient, under the definition of Secretary Wallace, because they cannot meet the prices of foreign competitors. In the country districts the farmers are engaged largely in raising fruits, vegetables, poultry, and eggs, and in dairy farming. They likewise need tariff protection and are therefore inefficient, according to the internationalistic philosophy of the men in control of this Government, alleged to have extraordinary brain development.

So far as I can now recall the only major business in my district which is efficient is the typewriter industry. Foreign competitors cannot yet compete successfully with the American typewriter manufacturers because they have not a comparable product, but I am told that certain foreign competitors are making improvements rapidly and when they are able to invade our markets, my typewriter friends automatically become inefficient, if we accept the strange new American doctrine of the President's pedagogical prodigies. We have had protective tariff laws in this country since the first Congress. It was one of Abraham Lincoln's planks when he ran for President. We have become something more than a nation of serfs and peasants because of them. "Infant industries", an expression which inspires our Democratic friends to pleasantries, were born when the inventive enterprising spirit of America was wedded to the protective tariff. The infants became giants and can compete with the industries of the world in the quality of their products, but they cannot meet the prices of foreign manufacturers because American wages and the American standard of living grew with industrial development beyond that of any other nation. This is the explanation of the inefficiency which this administration hopes to eliminate.

But can it be eliminated? If necessary tariff protection is taken away, American manufacturers must reduce costs of production to those of their foreign rivals or close their doors. Labor must accept wages only a little above the wage scale of Europe and the Orient. In no country on earth are the wages so high or the hours so short as in America. Every decent person in this country, except the internationalist, respects the honest American laborer and artisan and wishes to give him a greater share of the good things of life, but if protective tariffs are removed, the American workingman must come down to the level of his foreign rival or lose his job. The latter will be his fate, because under the N.R.A. foreign labor conditions are impossible in this country.

Let me give a specific example of what this new recovery step means. A protagonist of the new deal has cited cutlery as one of the American industries that ought to be sacrificed. In a village in my district there is a factory making cheap pocketknives. It employs about 300 men and is the sole industry in that fine little American village. It is doing business because the much-reviled Smoot-Hawley tariff law provides for a duty of 1¼ cents each and 50 percent ad valorem on pocketknives, and because an efficient management, an intelligent group of workers, the most modern machinery, and minimum wages make it possible to compete with German manufacturers. If the tariff is reduced that factory must close. Little boys will not buy their knives any cheaper when this factory and the others in America like it are put out of business. The price will go as high as the traffic will bear, and 300 families in one little village will be pauperized.

What is to become of these people? Accept, if you will, the planned economy theories of the Federal faculty and ignore the feelings which cause human beings to form deep attachments to the hills and valleys of the country where they were born and lived their lives. The comparatively small group I have referred to cannot go to Germany to manufacture pocket knives; they cannot raise cotton, wheat, hogs, corn, even if they know how. There is already a surplus in these crops and the A.A.A. would stop them before they started.

The situation I have described may be multiplied several thousand times if this bill becomes a law and the internationalistic theories of Wallace, Tugwell, Ezekiel, Frank, and Frankfurter, the men behind the throne, are put into effect.

Apologists for this administration would have the country believe that the bill before us is a slight modification of the existing flexible provision in the Tariff Act of 1930, which has been sustained by the Supreme Court. Here is the essential language in that act: The Tariff Commission—

Shall investigate the differences in the costs of production of any domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article. In the course of the investigation the Commission shall hold hearings and give reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present, to produce evidence, and to be heard at such hearings * * *. The Commission shall report to the President the results of the investigation and its findings with respect to such differences in costs of production * * *. The President shall by proclamation approve the rates of duty * * * specified in any report of the Commission under this section, if in his judgment such rates of duty and changes are shown by such investigation of the Commission to be necessary to equalize such differences in costs of production.

The law limits the increase or decrease of any duty to 50 percent of the rates fixed by statute. That provision authorizes the President to raise or lower the duties fixed by Congress on imported articles, so that American producers of farm produce or manufactured articles may have protection in the amount of the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, under changing conditions. He may exercise this authority only upon the report of a fact-finding body which is required to hold public hearings and give parties interested an opportunity to protect themselves against hasty and ill-considered action.

The corresponding language of the bill before us—skipping the long preamble and apology—authorizes the President—

To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and to proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

For some inexplicable reason, unless it is to hoodwink people into believing there is similarity between the bill and existing law, the President cannot change existing duties by more than 50 percent under the proposed law. An arbitrary reduction of 50 percent in the duty on almost any imported article would be as effective as 100-percent reduction in destroying the American producer of that article.

It should be noted that the bill empowers the President to raise or lower duties without the investigation and report of any fact-finding body, without regard to the difference in the costs of production at home and abroad, without public hearings, without affording labor and industry an opportunity to fight for their livelihood, without giving public opinion a chance to be formulated and its influence to be felt.

It is utterly futile to discuss constitutional questions in this Congress. The bill plainly violates the Constitution in three particulars: It surrenders to the President the duty of Congress to regulate foreign commerce, the exclusive function of the Senate to ratify treaties with foreign nations, the exclusive prerogative of the House to originate revenue bills. This administration and its supine, complacent, and obedient majority in Congress apparently cares nothing for the safeguards that our forebears struggled for centuries to acquire.

The bill before us when enacted into law will give the President more power than any potentate of any nation has ever had in modern times. Behind closed doors, in secret, without notice, he may give the butter market of this country to Denmark, cheese to Switzerland, steel to Sweden, shoes to Czechoslovakia, chemicals to Germany, woolens to England, beef to Argentina, silk to France, wine to Spain, china to Italy, lumber to Russia, sugar to Cuba, and Heaven only knows how many American industries may be sacrificed for the benefit of Japan.

You Democrats have attempted to deify the President. You have rendered him a great disservice. The only men who can remain on pedestals long are dead. You can see nearly a hundred of them in Statuary Hall. Much as I admire the President as a man and a patriot, I am not willing to give him, or any President, the autocratic power contained in this bill.

In the hearings held by the Ways and Means Committee on this bill, I find a partial list of dutiable articles which foreign countries are deemed by the Tariff Commission to produce more advantageously than the United States. On that list are certain chemicals, china, wire cloth, pocket cutlery, filler tobacco, cheese, eggs, berries, grapes, beans, peas, tomatoes, cucumbers, eggplant, silk fabric, and several hundred other articles. The articles I have specifically mentioned are extensively produced in my district. The blanket clause at the foot of the list may include every other product of our factories and farms. I do not know what is in it. But I know this: I will never consent to giving the President or Professor Frankfurter's Phi Beta Kappa brigade the power to destroy the livelihood of any manufacturer, farmer, or workingman in my district without a hearing.

Ever since the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was passed, Democratic spellbinders have inveighed against its alleged iniquities. No Republican claims perfection for it. Congress, in the very nature of things, cannot enact any tariff measure that does not reflect compromises and coalitions between the divergent interests we represent here.

We have been honest enough to admit to ourselves that the widely advertised logrolling methods employed when a tariff bill is before Congress results in an unscientific law, and we have inserted the flexible provisions so that the President, who represents all our districts, may with the assistance of a nonpolitical Tariff Commission correct the inequalities of the law and make import duties conform with the declared purpose of our tariff legislation. The protective tariff law on the statute books is being savagely attacked, but no attempt is being made to correct its alleged defects through the legal machinery that has been set up. Instead, the President asks Congress to give him absolute authority, beyond his constitutional functions and contrary to the law of the land.

Mr. Chairman, millions of Americans are beginning to ask how far this bewildered Congress will go in surrendering its constitutional powers to the revolutionary group in the executive branch of the Government. It is not a partisan question. As the administration program unfolds there is increasing evidence of rebellion against what the President euphemistically describes as a "permanent readjustment of many of our social and economic arrangements." There are more conservatives, more constitutionalists, on the Democratic side of this House than there are on the Republican side; not so many in proportion perhaps but more numerically. All of you profess to admire Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson; most of you believe in their political philosophy. I know it from my daily contacts with you outside this Chamber. You are not radicals. How long will you permit yourselves to be beguiled by the artful and adroit use of disarming words?

It is not the Republican Party that is being destroyed in this fateful year; it is the Democratic Party. We on this side of the aisle are standing steadfastly for American ideals. We wish to eliminate the inequalities and injustices in our economic and social structure. Every thoughtful person knows that the greed and avarice of stupid men in favored positions have produced conditions which can no longer be tolerated. But we are not willing to sink the ship to destroy a few rats on board. We wish to preserve for our children a country where equality of opportunity for success in any useful field of endeavor is open to all our boys and girls, and where individual liberty is limited only by the requirements of a well-ordered society.

There is not any dispute between Democrats and Republicans on those two propositions when they speak frankly; but as long as the Democrats in Congress are anesthetized by the speeches of the floor leader ending in "stand by the President", and intimidated by the Speaker's blacklist, there can be no stopping of the program that is leading us straight toward Communism, which denies all liberty and is the worst form of autocratic government the world has ever seen.

Mr. Chairman, there is a rapidly growing number of worried people in this country praying that the Democrats will return to their party principles and election pledges.

The President recently said:

In common counsel and common purposes we shall find the corrective of a present unhappy tendency to look for dictators. The wisdom of many men can save us from the errors of supposed supermen.

If you accept that doctrine, you will vote against this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, the daily press and a number of my colleagues have become greatly exercised over the disclosures made by Dr. Wirt of Gary, Ind., to the effect that a group, strong in the administration, is actually working toward a revolution subversive of this Government and that President Roosevelt is the Kerensky of this movement, the intimation being that his regime will be short-lived, and that it will be soon followed by a violent overturn of the Government with communism in control.

While statements of this kind made by such an eminent authority deserve investigation, I am not one of those who believe that the American people will turn toward drastic action of this nature. I do not believe that Professor Tugwell has a secret supply of machine guns in his residence, nor do I believe that Dr. Ezekiel carries bombs around in his pockets. I doubt if any of the disciples of Felix Frankfurter, sometimes referred to as the "hot-dog boys", have as yet been selected as the Lenin and Trotsky of the forthcoming October revolution.

I do believe, however, that we have embarked, and are proceeding further each day on a course of governmental regimentation which, if followed to its logical conclusion, will bring about a change in our form of government almost as great as that accomplished by those famous followers of Karl Marx to whom I have referred. I believe further that there is an active group of radicals—call it the "brain trust", or what you will, which is intentionally, though quietly, working toward bringing about this complete change in the form of our Government. If citizens such as the good Gary school teacher are helpful in focusing attention on these trends, they will have performed a real service.

In the course of the last Presidential campaign Mr. Hoover made a speech in which he predicted that certain results would follow logically from some of the policies which his opponent enunciated. Mr. Hoover was often and wrongly quoted as having said that if Mr. Roosevelt were elected the grass would grow in a thousand streets. He did not say this. He did say, however, that if some of the policies which Mr. Roosevelt apparently supported were carried to their logical conclusion, then the grass would grow in a thousand streets. At the time much capital was made of this speech. Mr. Hoover was ridiculed as a man who had lost all sense of proportion, as one who would go to any foolish extreme in attacking his opponent's policies, but I am wondering whether, to the thinking man today, Mr. Hoover was far wrong. I give it as my considered opinion that if we pursue very much further the course on which we have embarked then most assuredly will the grass grow in a thousand streets.

We are now being asked to turn over to the President the right to make or break an industry without any delineation of the method by which the facts shall be collated on which he bases his actions; without any disclosure of the course of reasoning which should guide him in his decision; without any provision that the groups, large or small, capital or labor, whose very existence may hang in the balance, shall have the slightest right of protest or even of appearance to plead their case. If the test which the Secretary of Agriculture has laid down is to apply, the President shall have before him but one question, "Is the industry involved efficient?" And in this test of the efficiency of a particular industry the question of the cheapness with which it can produce is to be considered paramount.

Imagine for yourself the small town of one industry, and there are many of them in this country. Some adviser to the President, we do not even know how selected, from what Department, or even whether he is to be connected with the Government, gives him information as to the so-called "inefficiency" of such an industry, perhaps, forsooth, because those conducting the industry are trying hard to keep up their pay rolls to help their employees, or perhaps because the N.R.A. has compelled them to adopt certain wage scales and hours which require a certain selling price to keep alive.

Or perhaps some foreign country which has an exportable surplus of the particular article manufactured in this town offers some sort of a mutual arrangement for the import into that country of certain American goods, which arrangement appears to some other advisor of the President as a general advantage to the foreign commerce of the United States. Acting on the advice of one or the other of these gentlemen, the President reduces by 50 percent the duty on the particular article produced in the town to which I refer. By the inexorable operation of the law of supply and demand the foreign goods which thus come in make it impossible for the industry in question to compete further. This American plant, backed by American capital, employing American workmen, must close its doors, all for the benefit of a foreign plant, backed by foreign capital, and employing foreign workmen. Is there any doubt but that if enough of this kind of thing happens the grass will eventually grow in a thousand streets?

Do not misunderstand me. I do not say that the present tariff is perfect. There are undoubtedly some schedules which should be revised downward—some perhaps upward—but to give this power into the hands of one man, be he ever so able, public-spirited, and industrious, is casting on him a burden which he must perforce delegate, perhaps to a totally irresponsible subordinate.

It is a familiar argument on this floor, presented by administration supporters, that it is safe and satisfactory to give these enormous powers to the President, because he is such a great leader, has such wonderful judgment, and will, of course, exercise these powers with the greatest care and for the greatest good of the country. Such an argument shows a very naive view of the office of the President. Is there anyone who believes that the President can personally attend to the multifarious duties which have been cast upon him? Even in normal times the great majority of the Chief Executive's work must be delegated, and in times like these where new duty after new duty has been placed on his shoulders, no mortal man would be capable of attending personally to everything. It naturally follows that the great majority of these duties must be delegated, even though the Executive Orders which follow bear the President's signature. The question, however, of whose advice is being followed, or who prepared the Executive Orders, is usually shrouded in deep mystery. Under the proposed bill the very lifeblood of the industry of a particular locality may be within the control of some one of the group of gentlemen against whom we are now being warned.

The present bill is really another manifestation of the way in which administration measures are inextricably mixing the question of recovery and that of social change. We all want recovery, and we want it as soon as possible. I doubt if many people in this country want basic changes made in the social and economic structure of the Nation. Moreover, such great changes are calculated to retard rather than advance recovery. We all want business to go forward, but it is axiomatic that business must necessarily languish in times of economic and social transition. Business must have reasonable certainty in order to prosper, and such transition brings nothing but uncertainty. If we review many of the chief administration measures adopted during the past year we see a continual development of this phenomenon.

A typical example of this is the Bankhead cotton bill just passed by this House. Last spring we had provided that certain agricultural commodities should be established as basic; that a processing tax should be levied for the benefit of those producers of these basic commodities who would voluntarily curtail their acreage. Serious objection though there might be to such a bill because of the fact that all consumers of the processed commodity would pay the tax for the benefit of the producer, there was at least no compulsion.

In the Bankhead bill, though concealed under the laudable argument that something must be done to protect the majority of the producers of cotton against the antisocial producer who is unwilling to cooperate, as a matter of fact, the vicious principle of compulsion first rears its ugly head. If the Government may exercise the power to tell the owner of a piece of property arbitrarily what he may or may not produce, what is to prevent the Government from taking equal action with respect to all production, both agricultural and industrial? Is this such a far cry from the Russia of today?

The securities bill passed last spring was ostensibly to protect the investor against himself, but here again the concealed vice of the measure was that it made new financing practically impossible, resulting in the drying up of the stream of long-term credit which industry needs to go forward. Is it beyond the realm of imagination that this may have been the actual purpose of the framers of the legislation? Long-term financing industry must have. If it cannot receive it elsewhere it must get it from the Government, and if it gets it from the Government, the Government can make whatever restrictive conditions it may choose.

The proposed securities exchange control bill is another step along the same lines. Here again is the surface appeal of protecting the investor from stock manipulation, but the basic, though concealed, principle is to place the Government in a directory position over all large industries. Is it beyond the realm of imagination that the unknown but powerful drafters of this legislation visualized this as another step in the social revolution?

The gold devaluation bill was another typical example. Most people looked at it solely as a revaluation of the dollar; whereas its concealed purpose was a direct and vital blow against the Federal Reserve System. Is it too much to imagine that the framers of this act had the cold, calculating purpose of crushing the Federal Reserve System, and thus making the central banking institution of the country a branch of the Government itself with all the political possibilities and consequences which have been found so disadvantageous wherever this system has been adopted?

Mr. Chairman, it may be argued that any single one of these steps does no immediate harm, and is justifiable in times of emergency. The accumulated effect, however, is far-reaching and yet the approach has been so insidious that the people of the country have not yet waked up to what is happening. When they do wake up they may be faced with an accomplished fact, and it will then be almost impossible to turn back the hands of the clock and retrace our steps. We may find ourselves completely in the control of an absolute centralized authority, which is a polite way of saying "dictatorship." That word may shock us, but if we become long enough used to the circumstance, the name will thereafter mean little.

A well-known quatrain from Pope seems to be most pertinent to this situation:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet, seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Mr. Chairman, it is so with dictatorial authority. Though we may resent it when first presented, when we are faced with it day after day, approaching us first from one direction and then from another, we finally become used to it, and thereafter remain supine and contented. That is the tendency today, and if that tendency remains long unchecked, our American liberty is gone forever. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 8687, the Tariff Act of 1935, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H.R. 8687

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, it is universally conceded that we have witnessed and are still in the greatest financial depression that has ever engulfed this Nation. Forty-two years ago this Nation experienced a similar depression, and during those years our agriculture and industry suffered in very much the same manner and to approximately the same extent as we are now suffering. Our banking institutions and finances in general were in a deplorable state.

I well remember that one of the chief controversial matters during the McKinley and Bryan campaign of 1896 was that of expanding our commerce and particularly our foreign trade. During his administration President Cleveland advanced precisely the same argument and took exactly the same stand against reciprocal tariffs and foreign-trade agreements that is taken today by the leadership of the Republican Party; and at that time, 1896, William McKinley, who was then a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, took exactly the same position that President Franklin D. Roosevelt is taking today. Following the election of 1896 President McKinley entered into many trade agreements and reciprocal tariff arrangements with foreign countries. Those of us who are members of the Democratic Party and who remember well those hectic days are glad to voice our opinion that, following these reciprocal agreements entered into by the McKinley administration, prices in general began to advance. The farmer, instead of $2.50 per hundredweight for hogs, received a gradual increase until in 1900 he was selling his hogs for 5 and 6 cents per pound. All other agricultural commodities followed suit. Our foreign exports of agricultural commodities was built up under the McKinley administration until in 1898 it reached approximately $1,000,000,000 per year, which was the high point in the history of this Nation, and I might say is approximately three times that which it is today, although during those 35 years the population of this country has approximately doubled and the wealth of the country is more than four times what it was at that time.

There is an old Latin phrase used in logic "post hoc ergo propter hoc", which translated means "coming after and therefore due to it." Whether this may be considered a fallacy or not, the cold fact remains that it was the contention of the Republican Party in 1896 that reciprocal tariff trade agreements would increase the foreign commerce and in turn would aid the American farmer in disposing of his surplus crops and would thereby assist in advancing the prices of American crops. And whether or not we accept the benefits which followed that program as due to the tariff policy of President McKinley, the fact remains that the treatment applied seemed entirely successful. Today we find the two parties have absolutely changed their positions in that the party of Franklin D. Roosevelt is advising that we return to the policies followed by President McKinley in building up our foreign commerce, and the Republican Party of today is alined solidly behind the arguments advanced by President Cleveland and the policy which he pursued. Certainly it would seem the part of good judgment to return to that program which we believe was largely responsible for the prosperity which followed the McKinley administration and assuming that it was at least in part responsible for that prosperity, to again give it a trial.

Much criticism has been advanced during the past few days of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace's testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means. I wish to quote here some of the statements made by the Secretary, but before doing so I want to state emphatically that President Roosevelt and not Secretary of Agriculture Wallace will in the last analysis be the one who will control and correlate this program. I might well quote Secretary Wallace's statement on page 53 of the hearings, in which he stated as follows:

Mr. WALLACE. It seems to me, sir, that the essence of the new deal, if I may be permitted to say it, is to take account of human rights. It would seem to me, also, that a man of the character of the President, in administering powers of this sort, would not be so inhuman as to retire in any barbarous way, such as you seem to contemplate, inefficient industries.

On page 45 of the hearings Secretary Wallace gave as his opinion that tariffs which are high tend to the production of unemployment in the efficient industries. The reason why this is true is because under the high-tariff program of the last administration approximately 50 foreign countries built up tariff walls against our export industries to such a height that it was absolutely impossible for them to continue their foreign trade, and therefore, although these industries had been highly efficient in the past and well able to compete with foreign manufacturers, still these barriers put them out of business, so to speak, and produced a tremendous unemployment in these highly efficient industries. His statement is as follows:

For my own part I believe it is important for the Congress to realize that high tariffs cause unemployment just as surely as low tariffs, perhaps even more certainly. It is just a question of where the unemployment is to be. In the case of high tariffs, unduly high tariffs, the unemployment is in the efficient industries which have been able to produce goods for the export markets. In the case of the low tariffs the unemployment would tend to be in the inefficient industries which are exposed to competition from abroad. Now, while that is a general statement of philosophy it is not a statement that necessarily applies immediately, and it would seem to me in the action under this particular bill, in case it became an act, it would be necessary to take into account the human problems involved in the case of the specific industry so that the matter would be handled not in a jerky, sudden way, but in a way that would do justice to the humanity which might be exposed too suddenly to foreign competition.

Much stress has been laid upon the statements of Secretary Wallace as to what he referred when speaking of inefficient industries, and particular stress has been laid by some of the members of the committee to the sugar-beet industry and other manufacturing industries which have required a subsidy in the matter of high protective tariffs during the past few years in order that they might continue in business. I wish to quote Secretary Wallace from page 55 of the hearings with respect to his opinion as to the application of reciprocal tariffs to agriculture. Mr. REED of New York asked:

Would you lower the tariffs, for instance, on butter, milk, eggs, wheat, and all these farm products? Do you think that would benefit the situation now?

Mr. WALLACE. Why, obviously lower tariffs on agricultural products would not benefit agriculture in those cases where they are effective. The butter tariff has been effective up until—oh, it was moderately effective up until 2 or 3 years ago. The increase in dairy production has been such recently, however, that the benefit does not amount to much.

Mr. REED. Then, do you believe, if that tariff were lowered now, it would help agriculture?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I am to some extent a partisan of agriculture, and I would hold on to all the agricultural tariffs I could get; from the national point of view, it seems to me that agriculture is entitled to exactly the same kind of tariff benefit as industry—to that and no more.

One of the articles that has brought forth an unusual amount of argument and criticism is that relative to the sugar-beet industry in the United States. Secretary Wallace, when asked about his opinion relative to this industry, replied as follows:

Mr. WALLACE. The sugar-beet industry, as measured from the standpoint of free world competition, is inefficient.

Mr. KNUTSON. And it should be abolished?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say so.

Mr. KNUTSON. Should it?

Mr. WALLACE. I have stood precisely and definitely before the Senate Committee on Finance for maintaining the sugar-beet industry on the basis of 1,450,000 tons, which is the average of the past 3 years. I do not think the beet-sugar industry should be allowed to extend further, because if it is expanded further, it is doing it at the expense of our export agriculture, it is robbing the wheat farmer of a market for flour in Cuba; it is robbing the hog farmer of a market for lard in Cuba. I think it is unsound economically to allow an industry of that type to expand further at the expense of efficient agriculture.

Mr. KNUTSON. We produce 94,000,000 pounds of beet sugar a year, and we consume 250,000,000; we have, in round figures, about 800,000 acres in the Red River Valley peculiarly adaptable to raising beet sugar; we are not permitted to do so; we are going to be compelled to continue importing about 150,000 pounds.

Mr. WALLACE. You would be doing it definitely at the expense of the American consumer and our efficient export industries, and that you should not be allowed to do.

Mr. TREADWAY. You have been touching on beet sugar, and I would like to refer to the sugarcane problem.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is a Democratic problem.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is an industrial problem. To what extent do you think the cane-sugar industry should be limited or placed under quota?

Mr. WALLACE. You are referring to domestic cane?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; in Louisiana.

Mr. WALLACE. The same philosophy should apply; there is no difference between the North and the South.

Mr. TREADWAY. You would not approve of the expansion of the growing of cane sugar in Florida?

Mr. WALLACE. I would not, unless it is an efficient industry, and it is clearly not; they cannot produce as cheaply there as they do in Cuba.

Mr. TREADWAY. They can employ American hands.

Mr. WALLACE. We will have more net material welfare if we produce things we can produce efficiently and exchange them for goods produced more efficiently elsewhere; we can produce lard cheaper today than it can be produced in Cuba; Cuba has an outrageous tariff on lard. Why not send Cuba our lard and take from her sugar?

Mr. TREADWAY. And stop the production of cane sugar in Louisiana.

Mr. WALLACE. Stabilize it on the basis of the last 3 years.

Mr. TREADWAY. With no expansion?

Mr. WALLACE. With no expansion; no.

Mr. KNUTSON. What are we going to do with the people operating inefficiently?

Mr. WALLACE. I think we have to consider human rights. That is the reason we have proposed in the sugar plan to give quotas on the basis of the average of the past 3 years. They are not allowed to expand; they are to be paid the parity price on the average production of the past 3 years, a production greater than any year except the past year. They are not going to be thrown out of work; they are given certain benefits and not allowed to expand.

The Secretary has stated definitely his views relative to the expansion of this industry. I want to say again that they are only his views as a member of the Cabinet and that Secretary Wallace will not have the administration of this legislation, but in view of what he has said relative to the production of cane sugar, I wish to read a statement made by Prof. John R. Commons in a pamphlet entitled, "Agricultural Tariffs", and statements based on investigations under the direction of Benjamin H. Hibbard, John R. Commons, and Selig Perlman, of the University of Wisconsin.

In discussing the Hawley-Smoot tariff, then under consideration, Professor Commons said:

The present sugar duty cost the American public about $289,000,000 during the year 1928. The average farm family consumes about 405 pounds of sugar annually in all forms; the urban family about 432 pounds. On the assumption—which is carried through the following calculations—that in the long run the sugar tariff is paid by the consumer, the annual cost of the present sugar duty is equivalent to about $9 per farm family and about $10 per urban family. The present tariff burden will thus be increased nearly $4 per family, making the annual total cost to the American public $384,000,000, or about $13 per farm and $14 per urban family. To the extent that the duty is absorbed by the manufacturer the actual burden on the family is decreased. The total burden to the Nation, however, remains the same.

BURDEN DOUBLE THE REVENUE

The Federal Government, however, derived an average annual revenue of $135,000,000 during the 7 years 1922–28. This is equivalent to less than one half the cost to the consumer. The proposed tariff will net the Government $160,000,000 annually if imports do not decrease, and will cost the consuming public an additional $95,000,000, or a total of $384,000,000.

NET LOSS TO ALL FARMERS

Less than 3 percent of the American farmers get about $43,000,000 annually under the present tariff; and all of the farmers pay about $60,000,000, a net loss of $17,000,000 to all farmers. Under the proposed Hawley-Smoot tariff a few farmers will get about $59,000,000 based on present production. All farmers will pay nearly $77,000,000 in increased prices. This tariff, therefore, represents a net loss to all farmers of $18,000,000 per year.

These investigations and research work were made in 1928 at the time of the impending Hawley-Smoot tariff.

It is most illuminating, indeed, to reflect upon the conclusions drawn by Professor Commons regarding the amount which this tariff cost the farmers of this country for the sugar they used on their tables over and above the benefits which will accrue to the remaining 3 percent of sugar producers. Certainly no farmer in the whole United States would disagree with Secretary Wallace in his statements that such an industry should not be encouraged to expand. All of us believe that this industry should not be curtailed nor abolished entirely, but an industry requiring such a subsidy should not be encouraged to branch out.

The pineapple industry in this country, I think, is a glaring example of what might be termed inefficient industry, and certainly no one believes that this industry should be induced or encouraged to expand. Several years ago a group of promoters conceived the idea of developing the pineapple industry in southern United States. There were some 13 of these farmers who succeeded in logrolling a pineapple tariff through Congress which gave to these 13 farmers approximately $1,800 of benefits per year for their industry. The industry did not expand, and, in fact, during the course of a short time 3 of the 13 growers discontinued their operations, leaving but 10 in the industry. The amount of revenue brought into the United States through this tariff amounted to approximately one-half million dollars, but the middlemen and handlers of pineapples pyramided their prices until this increase in the tariff cost the consumers of the United States approximately $1,500,000. This in order that these 10 preferred growers might receive $1,800 subsidy on their industry. This would amount to about $180 per year apiece. It would have been far better financial economics if the Government had pensioned these growers for life than to saddle upon the consuming public a subsidy amounting to over $1,000,000 per year.

In the manufacturing sphere, I wish to mention the matter of surgical instruments, and to include a statement made by the Honorable DAVID J. LEWIS, of Maryland, former member of the United States Tariff Commission, as summarized in his Tariff Studies:

Financial reports of companies producing these instruments show profits that are in keeping with the excessive prices being paid by users. One illustration will suffice to show that the industry is not lacking prosperity. The Central Scientific Co., of Chicago, which is seeking higher duties on its products, 5 years ago increased its capital stock from a total of $100,000 to $500,000 common and $500,000 preferred by means of a stock dividend. In 1926 it paid dividends which averaged 13 percent on the $1,000,000 of capital stock; in 1927 it paid 11 percent; and in 1928 it paid 13 percent. The latter rate is equivalent to 130 percent on original investment. In addition, the company has accumulated $200,000 surplus since the stock dividend 5 years ago. For each $1,000 worth of common stock held prior to the stock dividend the owner would now have $10,000 in par value and more than twice that amount in value based on dividends and earnings, and would have received an average annual income of $1,233 during the past 3 years.

Thus the prices of these surgical instruments, being 109 percent higher than pre-war, are at present 48 percent above normal, judged by the average prices now obtaining for other commodities. In the case of dental instruments, representative articles show an increase of prices in 1929 over 1913 of 266 percent. Since the general increase of prices as above stated was but 40.4 percent, these dental prices are now 160 percent excessive, judged by the average prices of other commodities.

As a member of the surgical profession I can truthfully state that there are practically no surgical instruments purchased by the ordinary surgeon that are not made abroad, largely in Germany. I have been reliably informed that there is but one manufacturing house in the United States that produces wholly all of their own surgical instruments. There are many manufacturers who produce a few of the surgical instruments which they sell. The greater proportion of such articles which they sell under their own name are manufactured abroad and imported into the United States. The tariff at the present time on surgical instruments is terrifically high: 70 percent. Certainly, inasmuch as these instruments are purchased from Germany, why would it not be good business judgment to permit them to have the tariff rate lowered on these instruments in order that the American purchasers and the patients of surgeons, who in the last analysis must pay for these instruments, might receive the benefits of this lowered tariff and at the same time trade agreements entered into with Germany in order that American wheat, pork, lard, and cotton might be shipped into Germany.

Much has been said in the hearings by Secretary Wallace relative to German toys, and here again I feel that the same argument should apply. In this connection I wish again to introduce a statement made by the Honorable DAVID LEWIS in his summaries of Tariff Studies.

From 1909 to 1922 the tariff rate on toys and dolls had been 35 percent. The rates in the present law, 70 percent, were adopted in 1922 because of abnormal European currency conditions. In the pending tariff bill the rates are increased, by indirection generally. The rate on pyroxyline dolls increased from 60 to 165 percent. Cost comparisons of representative dolls and toys indicate that the present difference in costs between foreign and domestic production is 21 percent. A reduction of the present tariff of 70 percent to the Aldrich rate of 35 percent seems to be indicated by the investigation. The Tariff Commission found that the costs for wages and salaries combined in the manufacture of toys and dolls, compared with the wholesale value produced, is 34.5 percent, approximately the ad valorem rate of the Aldrich bill. Extraordinary profits of manufacturers appear to be realized on these dolls and toys through the excessive prices permitted by the present tariff. The Faultless Rubber Co. of Ohio makes rubber toys. Its annual dividends are at present at a rate equivalent to 20.7 percent on its stock of $100 par value. In 1919 this company paid a special dividend of about 33 percent in Government bonds and in 1920 a special dividend of about 66 percent in preferred stock, which has since been retired at $103. The principal witness before the Ways and Means Committee in behalf of manufacturers of toys was A. F. Gilbert, of the A. C. Gilbert Co., Connecticut. It was incorporated in 1928 to take over the business and property of another company of the same name. The predecessor company paid dividends of 10 percent in 1925, 25 percent in 1926, and 30 percent cash and 100 percent stock in 1927. In 1928 the net earnings showed an increase of over 17½ percent.

In both of these industries—surgical instruments and the toy industry—the President is not asking that these industries be wrecked or curtailed in their production but that they should not be encouraged or induced to expand their activities.

Abraham Lincoln, in his homely philosophy, advanced the best argument, I believe, that has ever been produced on behalf of the protective-tariff system and its effect upon America in general. However, I feel that President Lincoln could have gone further in his argument and have been more conclusive. He stated that if an American wished to buy a suit of clothes, and purchased such suit in England, that England would have the $10—the price prevailing at that time—and America would have the suit of clothes, but if that American purchased the suit of clothes in Boston, America would have the suit of clothes and likewise the $10.

As stated above, I believe his argument could have been carried further to say that if the American spent the $10 for the suit of clothes in London, that the Englishman, under the reciprocity agreements, would come back to Kansas and buy up 10 bushels of surplus wheat with his $10, and the result would be that America would have the suit of clothes, the $10, and the Kansas farmer would have gotten rid of $10 worth of surplus wheat that has piled up in America to depress the wheat market.

I wish to state here and now that I believe there is not a Democrat in America who believes in free trade, nor is there one who believes in tariff so low that foreign producers may be allowed to steal away the American markets, but the philosophy advanced by President Roosevelt is that tariff should be sufficiently high to prevent undue flooding of American markets, at the same time to produce a revenue for the American Government, thereby decreasing general taxation, and that tariff rates in general should not be disturbed excepting that trade agreements might be entered into with foreign nations to the end that particularly the American farmer shall be allowed to dispose of his surplus production instead of destroying it, which in the last analysis is the only other alternative if he is to be protected from the effects of overproduction and underconsumption, and when such time arrives then the products of American agriculture may be disposed of in foreign markets sufficiently to absorb this price-depressing surplus.

The restrictions applied by the A.A.A., together with the unpopular and distressing processing tax, should be and will be absolutely removed if and when the free flow of agricultural products can reach foreign markets. There are just two methods at the present time of assisting the farmer to control his surplus production; namely, by restrictions in acreage and, secondly, by stimulating foreign and domestic purchases. During the prevailing emergency our Government has embarked upon the restriction program as a stop-gap, and the reciprocal trade agreement has been fostered and is being advanced with a view to future resuscitation of agriculture on a long-range program.

There are many who believe that if the country is prosperous the tariff must be increased to insure that prosperity; if the business of the country appears to be slipping, the tariff should be increased to start it back on the road to improvement; and if the country is in a severe panic or depression, the tariff should be stepped up and all will be hunky-dory. Most of us remember the statement made by ex-Senator Watson, of Indiana, on the floor of the other body when the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was under discussion in 1930. His statement in effect was:

I wish to say here and now—and I ask my colleagues in this Chamber to recall my prediction in the days to come—if this tariff bill is passed business conditions will begin to improve immediately, and within 1 year we shall have regained the peak of our prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that that prophecy did not materialize; in fact, the days and months which followed the enactment of that infamous bill saw increasing numbers of smokeless factory chimneys and motionless factory wheels. It saw increasing millions of unemployed walking the streets of our cities vainly seeking employment. Those predicted halcyon days saw farm prices reach the lowest levels that they have reached in the history of the country. Before this bill had been passed over 1,000 economists of this country, representing the largest universities and colleges in our land, petitioned President Hoover not to sign the bill, and we were informed by my colleagues the other day that he came near not signing the bill because it would not do for agriculture what had been promised them by the Republican platform of 1928. This I interpret as no defense of its admitted shortcomings.

I am in strict agreement with Secretary Wallace's statement in which he said:

I would hold on to all the agricultural tariffs I could get.

I believe they are absolutely necessary to protect particularly the dairy industry of this country as well as many other agricultural commodities. However, I do know that there are many industrial concerns that have grown hog fat entrenched behind tariff walls, and they have been veritable pirates on the people of this country. It is the old story of the American farmer getting a mouthful, while the industrialists are getting not only a meal but a real banquet. I cannot for the life of me understand the paradoxical argument that has been advanced on this floor in which advocates of the last tariff act accept glorified credit for having a $3 per thousand tariff placed on lumber, which together with the additional dollar per thousand taxes which has increased the price of lumber to farmers and builders to that extent, and likewise, the increased tariff on cement, wire fencing, and other building materials. In contending that such increases in tariff were of benefit to the farmers who must build barns, silos, granaries, and so forth, to me would require a great deal of political dexterity to convince the man who sells his crops on an unprotected market at prices set by the purchaser, and who is obliged to pay the prices set by the seller when he buys industrial commodities, that he is going to benefit one iota. In fact, I am convinced that the farmer of today, who does a great deal of reading and who has the radio at his command, is thoroughly awakened to the fact that the commodities which he purchases are protected 100 percent, and the commodities which he sells are protected in many instances not at all because of the surpluses produced on his farm. Therefore, if trade agreements can be entered into whereby he can have his surplus traded abroad and the stored grains that depress his market removed, he realizes that he can again go into the market and say he asks so much for his tobacco, corn, wheat, butter, and so forth, and will not have to submit to the humble pleading of, "how much will you allow me."

I have introduced a bill in the Congress, H.R. 3829, for the purpose of regulation of the importation of milk and cream and milk and cream products, such as cheese, butter, and so forth, which will prevent the importation into the United States of cheese and butter from countries in which the dairy herds contain a large percentage of tubercular cows and in which the dairy scoring does not conform to the standards as laid down by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture in the United States. This bill is simply a supplemental bill, or rather a substitute amendment to the Lenroot-Taber bill, which was passed by the Congress and signed by President Coolidge in 1926, and which applied only to milk and cream. The mechanics of my bill and the administration of the enactment would be precisely the same as the Lenroot-Taber bill, which legislation has been of untold benefit to the milk producers, particularly of New York State and the East.

In the hearings before the Agricultural Committee evidence was introduced showing that many of these foreign countries that ship cheese into the United States have tuberculosis existing in their herds ranging from 15 to 50 percent. It was the contention of these importers that the tubercular germs were automatically killed in the processing of the cheese. This contention is denied, and it has been conclusively shown through laboratory experiments by scientists and experts in tuberculosis to be untrue. It has been shown that the living tubercular germ can be recovered from such cheese in certain instances for a period of at least 200 days.

The herds in my native State of Wisconsin are tubercular free, there being less than two tenths of 1 percent of these herds that are infected. Wisconsin produces approximately 65 percent of the cheese in the United States, and the remaining 35 percent of the cheese is produced likewise in States that are largely tubercular free and accredited States. Therefore, our cheese producers are placed at the unfair disadvantage of being forced to compete with foreign importers who because of subsidies advanced to them by their governments are able to undersell our American producers, even after the tariff of 5 to 7.7 cents per pound on cheese has been deducted.

The matter of foreign organizations subsidizing their cheese importers was brought out in the hearings recently held on my bill before the Subcommittee on Agriculture, in which the evidence submitted and not denied showed that certain foreign governments organized so-called "import pools" in which such importers would sell their cheese in competition with American cheese and would be paid for the loss sustained by the foreign farmers who sold their cheese to the import pool, they, in return, remitting same to the farmers. In the last analysis, of course, the government from which this cheese was imported reimbursed the pool to the extent of their loss.

The only fair and right and just way of meeting this situation is to oblige such importers to comply with the health regulations of our country. If they can and will do it, there will be absolutely no restrictions on the importations. If they cannot and will not do it, they should not be permitted to import cheese into the United States.

It is my intention today, Mr. Chairman, to introduce an amendment to this bill for the purpose of protecting the rights of the American cheese producers and the American consumers against the unfair competition of this cheese which does not conform to the standards required of our American producers. Our dairy industry is amply protected by tariff at present. But we shall not consent that this tariff be lowered, but we do recognize the fact that when such tactics as these are entered into by foreign importers, in which their farmers are subsidized, that even the present tariff is not protective—and in view of the fact that our American producers have spent millions of dollars in perfecting their herds in the eradication of tuberculosis, and that the Government likewise has spent millions of dollars, we believe that we are asking for no unfair discrimination when we demand that foreign importers comply with our standards.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, the last few weeks there has been before this Congress a measure of vital importance which has been the subject of much discussion and debate. The bill (H.R. 8430), entitled "A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", if approved, provides that the President whenever he (in his discretion) finds that any existing duties on other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States, then he shall have the authority to enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments and he shall have the further discretion to reduce or increase any existing rate of duty in an amount equal to 50 percent of the existing rate.

Under article 1, section 8, of the Constitution, Congress is given the power to fix and levy duties. It is to be observed that this power is given solely and only to Congress by the people of the United States. Congress is therefore under a solemn obligation to the people of this country to jealously guard such a power, and even though it may have authority to delegate some of its powers, the fact, clear and unambiguous, is that the people of this country never intended that such power should be given to the executive branch of our Government. Had such an intention been in the minds of the people, they would have manifested it in specifying the powers granted to the Executive. An examination of the powers granted to the Executive fails to disclose any such intention.

There was evidently a particular reason for this fact; import duties having a serious and far-reaching effect on the economic life of the people and the industries of this country. Today, as during the time the Constitution was framed, the industries of this country were either nonexistent or struggling for existence. It was recognized that in order to protect these home industries some measure would have to be taken to prevent this country from being flooded with cheaply made foreign goods, making it impossible for our industries to compete and enjoy a decent standard of living. Today we are faced with identically the same problem.

Congress was given this power for one very important reason if for no other, that it is so constituted, representing as it does every community in this country, that it is able to investigate and ascertain the necessity and extent of protection needed by the industries in these communities, and further, that before any legislation is enacted affecting this vital phase of our economic life, opportunity by petition or hearing could be afforded the interested parties.

This act contemplates divorcing Congress from this obligation and placing this power in the hands of the Executive to use as his discretion deems advisable.

While I have full confidence in the President, it is obvious that it will not be in the discretion of the President that this trust will ultimately repose in the discretion of one or more of the "brain trust." The air-mail contract cancellation fiasco is a glaring example of what we can expect when discretion is imprudently delegated. Just as in the case of the cancellation of the air-mail contracts without hearing, or proper investigation, disregarding entirely one of the fundamental principles on which our Government is founded, so without any hearing the protection now afforded our industries already struggling for survival could be wiped away.

It is submitted, therefore, that before we Members of Congress divest ourselves of this obligation which we have sworn to fulfill and before we delegate this vital power to the members of the "brain trust", we consider carefully and thoroughly its consequences.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, the tariff bill which we are presently considering is the most momentous and revolutionary measure which has ever come before an American Congress. It marks a departure from all time-honored precedents. It involves a further surrender on the part of the representatives of the people to the will of the Executive. It is another step toward absolute dictatorship and the destruction of constitutional democracy. The outstanding characteristic of the present Congress has been its submissiveness to the will of the Executive. It now proposes a complete surrender of its most important power.

This tariff measure comes to us as a result of the message of the President to the Congress requesting power to enter into Executive commercial agreements with foreign nations. The Executive bases his request for enlarged powers upon the decrease in foreign commerce and cites as a reason for these extensive demands the fact that the executive branches of other important trading countries already possess similar powers. To many Members of the House the reference to the arbitrary and dictatorial powers of foreign rulers is neither a persuasive factor nor a wholesome citation. The present emergency provides the excuse by which the Executive would take unto himself the determination of the taxing privilege of the American Congress. History records that the pleas of necessity and efficiency have always been the pleas upon which every despot has founded his excuse for the assumption of extraordinary power.

The taxing power has been the most jealously guarded right of the American people. The power to tax is the power to develop or to destroy. It is the power which gives life or decrees death. It is the power to encourage initiative or to discourage endeavor. The right of taxation must be preserved to the American people if our personal liberty and our free institutions are to survive. A study of the bill indicates that the proposal is a complete change in tariff-making practices.

The President is given absolute authority to enter into trade agreements with other nations, to determine tariff rates, reducing or increasing them; and to abolish not only the right of this House to pass upon and determine such tariff regulations but the right of the Senate to approve the treaties. It has been urged upon us by administration spokesmen that the measure involves no surrender of the taxing power vested in this body by the Constitution. The efforts of the distinguished gentlemen of the majority to defend the bill on the ground that it is not a taxing measure have been superficial. The futility of their efforts and the lack of sincerity is all the more apparent by an examination of the record of the observations of these gentlemen on previous tariff measures. A tariff bill is a tax bill, and if the power to fix the amount of such tariff, either to raise or lower it, is delegated by this body to the sole determination of the Executive, it is tantamount to granting to the executive branch of the Government a power specifically committed to the Congress by the Constitution. The wisdom of the framers of our Constitution can be appreciated by a consideration of the document as a whole, but no better evidence can be found of the precautions exercised by the fathers than the provision for levying taxes. This all-important function was safeguarded to the people by its commitment to the legislative and not the executive branch of the Government.

I have the honor to be a Representative of one of the great industrial States—a State which has always been in the forefront of the industrial life of the Nation. Pennsylvania is proud of her industries. She is jealous of their welfare. She is ambitious for their development. She is committed to their protection. Our concern for these industries is prompted by our conviction that the welfare of her people depends almost wholly on the employment which these industries provide. Their happiness, their contentment, and their prosperity must be safeguarded. Their very sustenance is threatened by the proposed enactment of this capricious, theoretical experiment in foreign marketing.

The homes of my people—homes in which industry and thrift are taught, and in which frugality and honest toil seek to provide advancement and respect—these homes which nurture worthy American ideals are menaced by this amazing effrontery. My plea is not for the industries, my prayer is for my people. God guard them against the menace of this threatened destruction.

A reasonable certainty of tariff protection has assured the workmen, in whom I am interested, against the ravages of cheap foreign competition. If this bill is enacted, this certainty disappears, and in its place there looms the prospect of the sacrifice of these industries and her workmen on the altar of fantastic foreign-trade benefits. We have been assured that no sound, important American industry will be injuriously disturbed by the proposed agreements with the foreign nations, but we have no assurance as to the basis upon which the soundness or the importance of an industry shall be determined. In fact, the expressed purpose of the bill is not the protection of American industry or the American workmen but the development and encouragement of the importation of foreign goods to compete with the products of our own mills and factories. It is alarmingly apparent that it is intended to destroy certain industries which are considered unsuited to, or unimportant in the proposed international bargaining and an anticipated but not certain benefit in an agreement with some foreign manufacturing country will be a sufficient warrant for the wanton destruction of a Pennsylvania factory, or mill, or foundry, and the consequent dismissal and distress of the employees.

Each factory, each mill, each loom, each forge which provides employment to a single wage earner is an important industry to such wage earner and those dependent upon him. I am committed to his interests. He has the right of protection against a program by which he would become a mere pawn to be moved about under the rules of a planned economic game of chance. Is this proposal another link in the chain of collectivism which some would forge for the complete enslavement of American initiative and individual endeavor? I cannot subscribe to nor support the proposal to extend a communistic doctrine in the industrial field at the expense of the freedom-loving workmen of my district.

The majority has taken a pride in the mandate of the people by which it enjoys its present power, but the mandate of the people never contemplated a program such as the one presently before us. No Member of the House can be bold enough to suggest that his campaign pledges included an avowed purpose on his part to surrender to the Executive the right to impose taxes. Have we become so insensible of our duties and obligations that we are dominated by a spirit of complete subserviency? Are we entirely devoid of any sense of self-respect? Have we reached the point of admitting our unworthiness of the trust committed to our keeping? The power to tax is our power. It is a power that has been committed to us by the American people. It is a power which we cannot evade. It is a power which belongs solely to the Congress of the United States and should be exercised by it.

The surrender of this power to the Executive is the creation of absolute despotic authority. It will enable the Executive to create favorites upon whom he may bestow his pleasure and privilege. The favored industry, the favored business man, the favored group of employees may receive extended privileges and unwarranted rights at the expense of those who may not measure up to the Executive's delight and pleasure. I attribute no improper motives or purposes to the President of the United States when I join with others in this House in raising my voice of objection to the measure. In the hands of the present Executive the privilege which he seeks may be exercised with justice and equity, but we are confronted with the danger of the establishment of a precedent which may be disastrous. Again, we must be mindful of the fact that in spite of proper motives the present Executive or any future Executive is human. The fallibility of the human factor is present. Mistakes in judgment, errors in analysis, faults in conclusions should be guarded against by the customary methods of open hearings and public debate.

By this measure we create a star-chamber proceeding. Secret agreements, secret conferences, secret considerations, and secret determinations are to take the place of the open forum and public discussion of the taxing privilege. It is in the atmosphere of secrecy that collusion, intrigue, duplicity, and deception may breed. It is in the confines of the secret chamber that the rights of free men and free institutions are bartered away. Shall it be said of the Membership of the House that it was willing to trade its love of liberty, its love of free institutions, its love of American traditions, its love of American ideals, and accept in exchange therefor possible despotic abuses? I do not believe it. I cannot reconcile my understanding of the obligations of our oath with such wanton and abject surrender of our duties and privileges.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the foreign debt situation is definitely a part of the program of foreign commercial relations. The relationship of debtor and creditor is definitely a part of any trade relationship. The nation which buys from us becomes a debtor to us. The nation from which we purchase becomes our creditor. All of us are familiar with the debts presently owing to us by foreign nations and the people whom we represent are acquainted with the conditions prevailing at the present time in the international debt situation. Are we to become further involved in the intricacies of these foreign relationships by committing to one man the determination of advantage to be secured by entering into trade agreements with these countries, involving, as it must needs involve, some disposition of their present indebtedness to us? Is it not reasonable to suppose that each of the foreign nations will be alert and active in studying the advantages which come to them through such trade agreements and insist upon a favorable disposition of our claims against them before any possible trade benefits can come to us? Our experiences with foreign agreements have not been encouraging. We have had assurances and guaranties and agreements and covenants, none of which have been honored or kept. Is there any reason to assume that the contemplated trade agreements proposed by the Executive will have any greater binding force or efficacy than those which we have had in the past?

The plea of necessity and emergency has prompted the present Congress to give to the Executive unusual powers, but there is a time when even the most submissive man must realize the sense of danger which is present. We have vested in the President of the United States powers which were never sought by any of his predecessors and certainly never contemplated by those who framed our constitutional form of government. The President of the United States has assumed almost complete control of the destiny of the American people. The power which he now seeks would make him the most powerful ruler in the world. The quest for power has marked the efforts of all dictators. More power and still more power to the ruler means less rights and still less rights to the people. It is time to stop. It is time to call a halt. It is time to heed the danger of the course which we are following. The issue is clear. Popular government is on trial. Upon your vote and my vote depends the future destiny of the rights of free men, the continuance of free institutions, and the blessings given to us by our forefathers. We enjoy the privileges of a magnificent heritage—a heritage that has come down to us from the days when an English-speaking, liberty-loving people wrested from weak King John a Magna Carta; a heritage that has been further guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, the Habeas Corpus Act, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution. Shall this heritage be handed down by us to our children and our children's children unimpaired or shall we, in abject and servile surrender, destroy the blessings of liberty and the rights of free men? There is but one answer. God grant that there may be given to you and to me the courage to voice a positive and defiant declaration that there should be preserved for all time to come the rights of liberty and freedom without despotic spoliation.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. Speaker, this bill represents just one more step in the bloodless revolution in the throes of which America is alleged to be suffering.

It is a step through which the Congress is invited to abdicate still more of its constitutional power to a benevolent autocrat.

Never in American history, in war or in peace, have such tremendous powers been conferred upon the Executive as have been now naively asked by the administration of the present Congress, and each time the Congress has yielded its prerogatives to the executive branch.

There has been debate in the House as to whether or not this measure proposes to transfer taxing power to the President, the issue being, Is a tariff a tax? In his book, Looking Forward, published after he became the Nation's Chief Executive, the President says at page 177:

A tariff is a tax on certain goods passing from the producer to the consumer.

So, to the embarrassment of his supporters, he cuts through their mass of legal oratory and calmly states, "A tariff is a tax."

This bill constitutes a definite, clean-cut step away from the ideals of America toward the ideals of Soviet Russia. It is my purpose to discuss it from an agricultural standpoint only, and with particular reference to its effects upon the people and industries of Minnesota.

Following the Agricultural Adjustment Act, enacted at the special session, measure after measure has been forced through Congress, each granting greater powers to the Chief Executive, or some one or more of his appointees.

In nearly every instance, the powers of the legislative branch of the National Government have been lessened and those of the executive branch increased. In many instances the inspiration for the acts has come from Russia, and the theory of government back of it is economic planning.

A few weeks ago the House passed the cotton bill and introduced into American agriculture for the first time the principal of compulsory control. That act is described in the Washington Herald of March 20, as follows:

It is too complicated for an explanation to be made that would be intelligent, but in brief, it provides that hereafter the world's supply of cotton will be raised by India, Egypt, and Russia.

There is now before the House Committee on Agriculture a sugar bill, which proposes to restrict production of sugar beets and the manufacture of beet sugar in continental United States, in the interest of the cane-sugar producers of Cuba and the capital invested in refineries there.

The third step is a mysterious bill, frequently referred to on this floor but thus far not brought out into the light of day, by which it is proposed to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, by placing under the Secretary of Agriculture agricultural commodities other than basic agricultural commodities under such rules and regulations as the Secretary may deem necessary. Now, on top of these three proposals, comes this latest monstrosity, delegating to the President some of the legislative powers of the Senate and House, and the power of life and death over American agriculture.

The purpose of this talk is to prove that H.R. 8687 is:

First. Contrary to the principles of the Democratic Party as enunciated in its platform pledges.

Second. A violation of the campaign pledges of the Democratic candidate.

Third. A definite attack upon the interests of agriculture.

Fourth. Will prove harmful in practice.

During the life of the Democratic Party it has never proposed such unwarranted and autocratic delegation of congressional power to the President. In its 1932 platform the party declared:

We advocate a competitive tariff for revenue, with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference, reciprocal tariff agreements with other nations, and an international economic conference designed to restore international trade and facilitate exchange.

You will note that the recommendation is for a fact-finding tariff commission. In 1928 the tariff plank in point said this:

(c) Abolition of logrolling and restoration of the Wilson conception of a fact-finding tariff commission, quasi-judicial and free from the Executive domination which has destroyed the usefulness of the present Commission.

It is noticeable in the above that the party went definitely on record as opposed to the principle of the present bill.

In its 1920 platform Democracy stated its policy on the tariff to be:

We reaffirm the traditional policy of the Democratic Party in favor of a tariff for revenue only, and we confirm the policy of basing tariff revision upon the intelligent research of a nonpartisan commission rather than upon the demands of selfish interests temporarily held in abeyance.

Now, it is noticeable that there is no proposal to enlarge Executive powers, but, on the contrary, definite commitment to intelligent research by a nonpartisan commission.

In 1916, the tariff plank said in part:

The Democratic Congress is providing for a nonpartisan Tariff Commission to make impartial and thorough study of every economic fact that may throw light either upon our past or upon our future fiscal policy with regard to the imposition of taxes on imports or with regard to the changed and changing conditions under which our trade is carried on. We cordially endorse this timely proposal and declare ourselves in sympathy with the principle and purpose of shaping legislation within that field in accordance with clearly established facts rather than in accordance with the demands of selfish interests or upon information provided largely, if not exclusively, by them.

Here, it is noticeable that not only is there no suggestion of autocratic control by the Chief Executive, but the party commits itself to legislation within that field.

The same policy prevailed in 1912, when the tariff plank in point is this:

We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry.

Again the proposal is this, "legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry."

And so the party platforms ran. At no time has the Democratic high command declared in its campaign platforms for the dictatorship plan of government desired by the group of young professors, who are now serving as advisers in the formulation of the administration's agricultural program.

In no Democratic platform has there been either promise or request for such a bill.

In no campaign speech did the Democratic nominee for the Presidency promise, ask, propose, or suggest such legislation.

Every platform of the party has proposed some other form of action in the same way the campaign speeches of the candidate proposed either some other form of action or this form of action without any suggestion of autocratic domination by the Executive.

In his radio speech interpreting the party platform, delivered from Albany on July 30, 1932, the candidate said:

A tariff is a tax laid on certain goods passing from the producer to the consumer. * * * Peasants who live at lower levels than our farmers, workers who are sweated to reduce costs ought not to determine prices for American-made goods. There are standards which we desire to set for ourselves. Tariffs should be high enough to maintain living standards which we set for ourselves. * * * A commission of experts can be trusted to find such facts, but not to dictate policies. The facts should be left to speak for themselves, free from Presidential interference.

Surely nothing could be more definite than such a statement. A commission of experts to determine facts, free from Presidential interference.

On September 15, 1932, at Topeka, Kans., the President, then a candidate, declared, in dealing with the needs of agriculture.

I seek to give to that portion of the crop consumed in the United States a benefit equivalent to a tariff sufficient to give your farmers an adequate price.

I want now to state what seem to be the specifications upon which most of the reasonable leaders of agriculture have agreed, and to express here and now my whole-hearted accord with these specifications.

First: The plan must provide for the producer of staple surplus commodities, such as wheat, cotton, corn (in the form of hogs) and tobacco, a tariff benefit over world prices which is equivalent to the benefit given by the tariff to industrial products.

Thus, by the middle of September, he had made public his tariff policy and his program to relieve agriculture. His statements were confirmed one week later, by the following statement in his Sacramento speech:

I have called for genuine governmental efforts to devise means by which the farmer may get the benefit of the equivalent of a tariff protection similar to that which industry has.

Continuing his discussion of agricultural problems, he said at Sioux City, Iowa, on September 30, 1932, the following:

What does the Democratic party propose to do in the premises?

The platform declares in favor of a competitive tariff which means one which will put the American producers on a market equality with their foreign competitors—one that equalizes the difference in the cost of production—not a prohibitory tariff back of which domestic producers may combine to practice extortion of the American public. * * *

But how is reduction to be accomplished? By international negotiation as the first and most desirable method, in view of present world conditions—by consenting to reduce to some extent some of our duties in order to secure a lowering of foreign walls that a larger measure of our surplus may be admitted abroad. * * *

Next the Democrats propose to accomplish the necessary reductions through the agency of the Tariff Commission.

Thus far, it is apparent that there has not been the slightest suggestion of transferring to the President powers of Congress to conclude tariff treaties.

The principles he had stated in his earlier addresses were reaffirmed by him in the closing days of the campaign. On November 4, 1932, at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, he declared:

I have sought during these months to emphasize a broad policy of construction, of national planning and of national building, constructed in harmony with the best traditions of the American system. I have concentrated of necessity upon the broad and immediately insistent problems of national scope. * * *

At Sioux City, Iowa, I proposed a tariff policy aimed to restore international trade and international commerce not only with this Nation but between all nations of the world.

In October, he vigorously proclaimed a tariff policy exactly opposite to that which his supporters are now urging in the present bill. He said on October 20, at Wheeling, W.Va.:

I have advocated a lowering of tariffs by negotiation with foreign countries. But I have not advocated, and I will never advocate, a tariff policy which will withdraw protection from American workers against those countries which employ cheap labor or who operate under a standard of living which is lower than that of our own great laboring groups.

Down in Atlanta, Ga., on October 25, he proclaimed his Americanism and emphasized the value of the American market. His words were:

FARMERS' PURCHASING POWER MUST BE REESTABLISHED

I, on the other hand, am saying over and over that I believe that we can restore prosperity here in this country by reestablishing the purchasing power of half of the people of the country, that when this gigantic market of 50,000,000 people is able to purchase goods, industry will start to turn, and the millions of men and women now walking the streets will be employed.

I am, moreover, enough of an American to believe that such a restoration of prosperity in this country will do more to effectuate world recovery than all of the promotional schemes of lending money to backward and crippled countries could do in generations. In this respect, I am for America first.

This doctrine I set forth when my campaign really began back in April. I said in a speech then that we had forgotten this potential market of the agricultural population and that the true interest of this country was to return to this forgotten market. We have, as in the old story of the Holy Grail, looked beyond the seas for the riches that were lying unnoticed at our very feet.

When we come to recognize this simple fact, when we get back to plain, common sense, when we stop worshiping false gods and chasing rainbows, happiness and prosperity will come to American workers and farmers and business men—to the American people.

On the following day at Baltimore he declared that it was silly to suggest that he would even think of such a program as that which is the real basis for the unfortunate bill now under discussion.

This bill contemplates restriction or destruction of inefficient industries in America in the interest of broadening the markets of those industries deemed to be efficient.

President Roosevelt, then the Democratic nominee, made the following definite statement:

My distinguished opponent is declaring in his speeches that I have proposed to injure or destroy the farmers' markets by reducing the tariff on products of the farm. That is silly. Of course I have made no such proposal nor can any speech or statement I have made be so construed. I said in my Sioux City speech in discussing the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930:

"Of course the excessive, outrageously excessive rates in that bill must come down, but we should not lower them beyond the point indicated."

The point indicated was that no tariff duty should be lowered to a point where our natural industries would be injured. Again in my Sioux City speech I made the Democratic position plain where I said that negotiated treaties would be accomplished "by consenting to reduce, to some extent, some of our duties in order to secure a lowering of foreign walls that a larger measure of our surplus may be sold abroad."

Of course it is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. I declared that all prosperity in the broader sense springs from the soil. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture and raising the price of farmers' products. I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

Could anything be more definite, clean-cut, and understandable than his statement that "it is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products"?

Finally, at Boston, on October 31, he gave his final speech to agriculture:

Moreover, we need to give to 50,000,000 people who live directly or indirectly upon agriculture a price for their products in excess of the cost of production. That will give them the buying power to start your mills and mines to work to supply their needs. They cannot buy your goods because they cannot get a fair price for their products. You are poor because they are poor.

I favor—and do not let the false statements of my opponents deceive you—continued protection for American agriculture. I favor more than that. I advocate measures to give the farmer an added benefit, called a "tariff benefit", to make the tariff effective on his products.

Not a word anywhere about the power to negotiate being transferred to the President. Every campaign speech indicates clearly that that was not his thought.

No Democratic candidate, President, or platform ever declared for such a dictatorial, autocratic assumption of power conferred on Congress by the Constitution and now proposed to be placed in the hands of one man. Again it seems a part of the program of the bright young man whose inspiration today lies in Red Russia.

After assuming the office of President, the Chief Executive said, on page 188 of his book, Looking Forward, published last year:

I propose to accomplish the necessary reduction through the agency of the Tariff Commission.

Now, there is presented to the House a bill authorizing the President to negotiate and proclaim modifications of existing duties, and on page 3, lines 4 to 7, inclusive, occurs the following suggestive statement:

Except that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the granting of exclusive preferential treatment to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Republic of Cuba.

One of the valued interests of the State of Minnesota is the production of sugar beets with the companion industry of beet-sugar manufacturing.

It is elementary that where natural advantages favor foreign countries in the production of agricultural commodities, production of those commodities in this country must be tariff protected, or the American standard of living must be lowered to that of the competing nations.

American agriculture, like American labor, cannot compete with agriculture and labor drawing a lower wage and living on a lower plane, unless the advantages thus held by foreign producers are equalized or offset by a protective tariff or some other effective protective force.

In their program of sovietizing America, the Presidential advisers have given particular attention to the beet-sugar industry. In the beet-sugar industry Minnesota is particularly interested. The President of the United States in his tariff message, said in part:

I am requesting the Congress to authorize the Executive to modify existing duties and import restrictions.

In his message to the Congress recommending amendment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act he said in part:

I do not at this time recommend placing sugar on the free list. I feel that we ought first to try out a system of quotas with the threefold object of keeping down the price of sugar to consumers, of providing for the retention of beet and cane farming within our continental limits, and also to provide against further expansion of this necessarily expensive industry. * * *

The objective may be attained most readily through amendment of existing legislation. The Agricultural Adjustment Act should be amended to make sugar beets and sugar cane basic agricultural commodities. It then will be possible to collect a processing tax on sugar, the proceeds of which will be used to compensate farmers for holding their production to the quota level. A tax of less than one half cent per pound would provide sufficient funds.

Consumers need not and should not bear this tax. It is already within the Executive power to reduce the sugar tariff by an amount equal to the tax. In order to make certain that American consumers shall not bear an increased price due to this tax, Congress should provide that the rate of the processing tax shall in no event exceed the amount by which the tariff on sugar is reduced below the present rate of import duty. * * *

The use of such a base would allow approximately the following preliminary and temporary quotas: Continental beets, 1,450,000 short tons.

Taking the two messages together, and remembering that the proposed quota of 1,450,000 short tons for continental beets is a definite reduction of more than 300,000 short tons under last year, we have a definite, deliberate, and intentional suggestion from the Nation's Chief Executive that production of American beet sugar shall be reduced in the interests of Cuban producers and refiners. There can be no other interpretation and none need be sought, because it is practically admitted by those in authority that such is the case.

During the debates in the House there has been some effort to hoodwink Members by misquoting or partially quoting testimony. When the sugar bill was before the House Committee on Agriculture, on Monday, February 19, the President's message relative to sugar was presented, and thereafter Mr. A. J. S. Weaver, of the Department of Agriculture, testified. He spoke, in part, as follows:

Mr. HOPE. If it is not the purpose of the administration to reduce the price of sugar to the consumer, what objective is there then to permitting an expansion of the domestic industry in this country?

Mr. WEAVER. I do not follow that question.

Mr. HOPE. Well, I will repeat the question.

If there is no desire on the part of the administration to reduce the price of sugar to the consumer, what reason is there for restricting domestic production?

Mr. WEAVER. There, of course, is a desire; a desire on the part of the administration to reduce costs of living and to reduce the excessive costs of sugar to the population of the United States.

In this emergency situation it is not possible to do everything at once; but, now speaking from the point of view of long-time policy, if further expansion is continued, the United States will be saddled, possibly forever, with a high-cost industry, which is not a fair thing to contemplate for consumers.

Mr. HOPE. Well, then, in other words, the policy is to start in eliminating the industry before it gets any bigger. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; I think that is a reasonable statement.

Mr. CUMMINGS. What is that last statement?

Mr. WEAVER. My answer was, I think that is a reasonable statement.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Is it reasonable to say that the object of this bill is to give us a kind of a shot in the arm and slide us out of business while we are partly unconscious?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; that is much more desirable than being in, in coming to the fundamental question.

Remember that this is the unexpurgated edition. The above is what Mr. Weaver actually did say, not what he is alleged to have said or should have said. It is a presentation of his testimony as he gave it.

His candor was as embarrassing to the administration as his statements were shocking to the American public.

Four days later the Secretary of Agriculture testified before the Senate Committee on Finance. The following is quoted from pages 32 and 33 of the hearings:

Senator VANDENBERG. Who is Mr. A. J. S. Weaver?

Secretary WALLACE. He is head of our sugar section.

Senator VANDENBERG. How long has he been head of the section?

Secretary WALLACE. Oh, I think since last October.

Senator VANDENBERG. As a matter of fact, he is really the rice expert in the Department, is he not?

Secretary WALLACE. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. Now, he has had no material experience with sugar?

Secretary WALLACE. That is true.

Senator VANDENBERG. You are familiar with Mr. Weaver's testimony before the House committee. Do you agree with his conclusion that this is a scheme to give the sugar industry a shot in the arm and slide it out of business?

Secretary WALLACE. No, sir. I may say, in all fairness to Mr. Weaver, he happens to be a very intelligent and—

Senator VANDENBERG. Candid?

Secretary WALLACE. Brainy man; but on that occasion he had been traveling all night on the airplane, and had been subjected—

Senator VANDENBERG. You mean he was still up in the air?

Secretary WALLACE. He had been subjected to a considerable cross-questioning, rather rapid fire, and possibly his ears were still dimmed by the roar of the airplane motor.

Mr. Wallace appeared also before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. On page 60 of the hearings appears the following as a portion of his testimony:

Mr. WALLACE. The sugar-beet industry, as measured from the standpoint of free world competition, is inefficient.

Mr. KNUTSON. And it should be abolished?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say so.

Mr. KNUTSON. Should it?

Mr. WALLACE. I have stood precisely and definitely before the Senate Committee on Finance for maintaining the sugar-beet industry on the basis of 1,450,000 tons, which is the average of the past 3 years. I do not think the beet-sugar industry should be allowed to extend further, because if it is expanded further it is doing it at the expense of our export agriculture; it is robbing the wheat farmer of a market for flour in Cuba; it is robbing the hog farmer of a market for lard in Cuba. I think it is unsound economically to allow an industry of that type to expand further at the expense of efficient agriculture.

In considering Mr. Wallace's testimony we must bear in mind that the figures he gave—1,450,000 tons—are more than 300,000 tons lower than the 1933 production, so that it is proposed by the President, by the Secretary of Agriculture, and by the Secretary of Agriculture's sugar adviser, to reduce the American quota nearly a third of a million tons in order to permit an increased importation of Cuban sugar.

Now, remember that sugar is a nonsurplus crop and that never yet have American producers been anywhere near able to approximate the demands of home consumption.

No President, no Congress, no candidate, and no public platform has ever before had the temerity to propose restrictions on American farmers producing a nonsurplus crop either in days of affluence or stress, and no Presidential advisers prior to these Presidential advisers ever had the impudence to suggest that American farmers like those in the Minnesota Valley and in the valley of the Red River of the North should be sacrificed in the interest of agriculture of a foreign country. Such a proposal is internationalism gone wild. It can be defended on no principle of justice, equity, or right. Nor can it be proven in any way by anyone that during a time of world-wide depression giving the American market increasingly to cheap Cuban labor will put in the pockets of said Cuban labor sufficient funds to noticeably increase their imports of American manufactured goods, American grains, or American pork and lard.

The people of Minnesota are vitally interested in the production of sugar beets. They are the State's one nonsurplus crop.

During the last season 37,000 Minnesota acres produced 94,517,200 pounds of sugar.

The records of the Beet Sugar Association show that more than 5,000 Minnesota field workers were given employment in sugar beets, and that the industry afforded employment to 894 office and factory workers.

Payments to railroads for freight last year totaled $812,000, and the payment for supplies, including cotton bags and coal, amounted to $559,000. During the past 5 years payments to farmers for sugar beets grown in Minnesota have averaged more than $2,000,000 annually.

Sugar beets and the beet-sugar industry represent a valued establishment and important industry in the North Star State. As one authority puts it:

Sugar beets have been grown in Minnesota since 1906, when the first factory was established at Chaska, just outside Minneapolis. In 1926 when agricultural experts were seeking a crop to restore the thousands of acres in the Red River Valley, which had grown thin and sour by constant wheat crops, the second factory was erected at East Grand Forks. The improvement of the Red River lands and the restoration of their fertility since that time are matters of common knowledge throughout the State. From time to time since 1926 various communities in the Red River Valley have petitioned that additional factories be established so that the farmers might be assured of one staple crop with a definite cash value.

Beets cannot be grown successfully by haphazard plantings which are often the case in corn and wheat. Beet culture requires an intense and intelligent rotation of crop, not only requires but actually enforces it. As a consequence of the industry, feeding operations spring up to utilize the beet top and beet pulp, and this farm-and-animal economy rehabilitates the soil through natural fertilizers.

Beets, as I have suggested, are not planted merely because a farmer has a few spare acres. On the contrary, beet lands and beet farms are built up to their highest possible fertility by farm management which is at once far-sighted and intelligent. To ask farmers to reduce or abandon acres after they have spent years in building them to the point of highest efficiency is a matter far more serious than the withdrawal of marginal lands from the production of wheat and corn.

Another authority, nationally known, writes me, in part, as follows:

I think if you would take time to find out just who raises beets, you would find from California to Minnesota only the better class of farmers are raising beets. You would also find that especially here in Minnesota and Iowa we employ but very few Mexicans, most of the labor being done by local white workers, who, under our present system of growing beets, earn from 40 to 60 cents an hour, which I think is comparable to the average wage that is being paid for most laboring work and more than what is being generally paid for farm labor.

It is the one crop that is not overproduced in this country and also about the only field crop that has actually given the farmer a profit, and I think, if you would talk to any business man in a community where beets are raised in the entire United States, he would tell you the beet farmer is in much better financial condition than any of his neighbors who are not growing beets.

We, here in Minnesota, operate only two factories, but last year we paid around two and one half million dollars to beet farmers, who, in turn, paid about $1,000,000 to beet labor, and we paid to railroads in excess of one million and a half.

The following is a telegram of protest from the president of the Northern Pacific Railroad to the Secretary of Agriculture:

ST. PAUL, MINN., February 19, 1934.

HON. HENRY A. WALLACE,

Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.:

Seconding the protests which reach me from sugar-beet areas and on behalf of the Northern Pacific I urge you to reconsider announced plans for bringing about reduction in beet acreage. Maintenance of present acreage is vital and indeed an expansion of present acreage is highly desirable to farm business and transportation interests in areas especially adapted to production of this crop. Curtailment of the beet crop would be definitely harmful from recovery standpoint as it would adversely affect fertilizer, machinery, coal, beet by-products, chemical, bag, and transportation interests as well as labor in field and machinery. No obligation to other countries can possibly be superior to that owing to the people of continental United States. To reduce production of a crop of which the present production constitutes less than half of domestic requirements is agricultural adjustment run wild and is wholly unwarranted blight on our domestic agricultural industry as well as on others associated with the handling of its products.

CHARLES DONNELLY.

These are illustrations only, but they are conclusive proof of the vital importance of the joint industries of sugar beets and beet sugar to the hard-pressed people of Minnesota.

However much politicians may talk partisan politics, certain facts in this discussion stand out as true, proved, and unrefuted:

First. The principle of this bill has never been urged by the Democratic Party through its platforms, its Presidents, its candidates, or its leaders.

Second. The bill itself is a creature of those Presidential advisers so steeped in sovietism that in their zeal they will sacrifice much to inaugurate in this country the theories and economic planning of Russia.

Third. The bill proposes to sacrifice the interests of that portion of agriculture and industry deemed by these zealots to be inefficient in the interests of some mythical agriculture or industry declared by them to be efficient.

Fourth. It is a step in a pointed path, planned now to restrict and ultimately to destroy the sugar beet and beet-sugar industry in the United States.

It is possible to enlarge the proof by discussion of proposed Presidential action relative to manganese—a Minnesota product—to lumber, cement, and many other lines. I am quite content to rest my case on the effect this misbegotten bill would have upon the sugar interests of my home State.

This bill is one more step down the soviet highway. It proposes to vest supreme power in one man.

For decades the Democratic Party has cursed the Republican tariff. Now, in a time of world crisis, when they hold the Presidency and control the Senate and House, is it possible that this bill represents the best effort of their united minds—to hand the job to the President?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as a Democratic Representative in this Congress, I have endeavored to live up to the principles of our 1932 platform in casting my vote. In furtherance of this mandate, I will support this measure, granting reciprocal tariff authority to the President, as a basic plank in our platform.

In this connection, however, I wish to call attention to several other features of our platform which as yet our party has failed to recognize through proper legislation. I refer to that provision which urges the enactment of every constitutional measure which will guarantee prices for basic farm commodities in excess of cost of production. I also refer to another plank which guarantees equal rights to all and special privileges to none. As yet we have not adequately legislated in accordance with these two basic planks of our platform, and I propose to refer to them later before concluding my remarks.

As a Representative from California, it is self-evident that I should seek to protect the best interests of my constituents but, at the same time, I should not be oblivious to the interests of the entire Nation. If the East and Middle West is prosperous, it naturally follows that they will purchase California products; and, following the natural inclination of most Americans, the people from these sections, once they are again prosperous, will continue to visit and settle in our Golden State, thus directly and indirectly adding to our prosperity.

This measure we are now discussing is fraught with enormous potentialities—potentialities which can be serious if improperly developed and administered—while the great good which will follow fair and just administration is self-evident. Having the fullest confidence in the President and believing sincerely that no Executive since Lincoln has been so sincere and honest in his endeavors, I feel justified in casting my vote to give him the power in his discretion to lower or increase tariffs in accordance with present law. The leading nations of the world all have reciprocal tariff authorities; and unless we clothe our Executive with the same authority, our position is somewhat analogous to that of the knight of old, in his old-fashioned armor, meeting a combatant trained and equipped in the light of modern military science. We are now fighting at a disadvantage in the marts of trade with foreign competitors who are using the most modern legislative equipment to secure economic advantages over us in international trade.

Candidly, I admit that questions of tariff are a distinct science and have only too often been applied to the advantage of certain groups or classes through the medium of politics and self-interest. It does not, however, require an expert to recognize the fundamentals of the Democratic platform, which pledges legislation for the farmers, to guarantee them the cost of production. For this reason, as far as agricultural commodities are concerned, I am in favor of increases in tariff rates wherever such, after due examination, are found to be to the best interest of agriculture and our Nation generally. I also favor granting the President authority for bargaining purposes to place a tariff on any article now on the free list. It must be borne in mind, however, that while the tariff may and should be utilized advantageously as a relief measure to aid in limiting our supply to a greatly diminished demand, it does not solve the problem by going to its heart.

The following table, showing a comparison of the imports of basic products of my district for the year 1926—before the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930—and the year 1932, and the average prices received for these products in California in those years, is enlightening:

Product	Year	Imports	Price in California
		Pounds
Eggs (fresh, dried, and frozen).....	1926	30,000,000	31.1 cents per dozen.
Do.....	1932	2,660,000	17.2 cents per dozen.
Lemons.....	1926	74,000,000	$2.81 per box.
Do.....	1932	7,700,000	$2.10 per box.
Oranges.....	1926	942,000	$3.05 per box.
Do.....	1932	1,745,000	$1 per box.
Walnuts (shelled and unshelled).....	1926	49,000,000	$480 per ton.
Do.....	1932	12,063,000	$240 per ton.

During the regime of the do-nothing, around-the-corner Hoover misadministration, the record of the number of banks and their deposits tells an enlightening story.

June 30, 1928:
Number of banks.....		26,213
Deposits.....		$58,431,061,000
June 30, 1932:
Number of banks.....		19,163
Deposits.....		$45,390,269,000

From the foregoing we find that 7,050 banks failed during the administration of Hoover, notwithstanding that the Republicans promised us prosperity and a full dinner pail through the enactment of the high Tariff Act of 1930.

It will also be noted that during the period of the largest importation of certain basic products of my district the prices received were very much higher than they were during the year 1932, when the importation of eggs dropped 91 percent, and that of other basic products enumerated showed marked decreases, with the one exception of oranges, the importation of which, in 1932, was double that of 1926. These official figures indicate that a higher tariff, such as today exists, with diminished importations, does not control the domestic price of these commodities. The domestic price of American products is controlled by the law of supply and demand rather than by any artificial means, such as subsidized, diminished domestic production, or curtailed importations through the imposition of tariff barriers. Because of the greatly reduced purchasing power of our people, the demand for our products at home has been materially lessened, and we should recognize and admit that the restoration and increase of such buying power with its consequent natural increase in demand is an essential step in the practical solution of our present production problems.

It is my opinion that the N.R.A. must be amended to protect the interest of the consumer, as well as the employee, against the monopolistic control which today appears to be held by the employer class. It is not considered just to the consumer and the employee that the monopolies created under the various codes should permit price fixing and lack of competition without a compensatory enactment to limit the income of the code monopolists. In the interest of protecting the smaller business man, the consumer, and the worker, legislation should be enacted, amending the N.R.A., so as to limit the net income of the larger basic industries of the Nation, including chain stores. If this is accomplished, it will permit the payment of higher wages with less hours of work and will contribute in a great measure to the solution of our unemployment problem.

Our transportation systems should also come under the provisions of the N.R.A. and their incomes be limited to an amount commensurate with their real value and not the watered value on which today they endeavor to pay dividends. False values (watered stock) of all basic industries should also be considered and incomes for these larger industries should be predicated entirely upon their real worth—and nothing more. Only in this manner will the consumer and employee be in a position to receive just compensation and the full benefits of the humanizing industrial advantages of the N.R.A.

Our platform declaration of equal rights to all and special privileges to none has not been observed by this Congress. An examination of the votes cast by the Members of Congress during this session, in my opinion, discloses that the virus of Wall Street and the anti-common-people serum of entrenched wealth has thoroughly inoculated many of the Members of this Congress. It is ridiculous to me to find the Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee bringing in a minority report, opposing the enactment of this measure, and insisting, as they are, that Congress is surrendering its rights to the Executive, which, in my opinion, is absolutely unfounded. This bill does not change one iota of law respecting the minimum and maximum tariff rates which the President may fix. The President has this right today under existing law, and this bill merely gives him the authority to apply the law immediately, in his discretion, without the inordinate delay incident to the application of the archaic tariff laws which the Republicans have saddled on the Nation, and which, in my opinion, have brought us to our present international trade stalemate.

I have closely checked the votes of the solid block of Republicans who have signed the minority report opposing this measure, and find that in the four last record votes, practically every one of them voted in the interest of Wall Street and against the interest of the common man. If Wall Street has representation in the Congress of the United States, such representation is preponderant in the Republican representation. To be more specific, check, if you will, as I have, the vote of this minority group and their Republican colleagues on the gold devaluation bill, the bonus bill, the silver bill, and on the bill which authorizes the Federal Reserve System (privately owned) to coin money on the basis of dubious paper security.

The new deal is progressing along the road to recovery, but not with the speed that I anticipated. In the interest of the common people, the bankers' influence in Congress must be overcome in order that we may have an adequate expansion of currency and credit through the exercise of constitutional prerogatives and not through the acts of private international bankers who, to the detriment of the people, now control the printing of currency and the extension of credit.

The administration and the Democratic Congress have two important steps to take. If we were justified and legally within our rights in devaluing the gold content of the dollar to 60 percent of its former value, we have the right to further devalue the gold dollar, which should be done at once in the interest of reducing our private and public indebtedness. By no stretch of the imagination, should we continue to hold our gold dollar at a higher value than the equivalent value of the gold of our foreign competitors. We must reduce our gold base to an equal if not lower base than that of our foreign competitors in order to regain our international trade and thus make this bill we are discussing more effective.

If the Congress and the President have the authority to devalue the gold content of the dollar and if the President has the authority to increase the value of domestic silver to 64½ cents per ounce as today applies, he also has the authority and should exercise it, to increase the value of silver to $1.29 per ounce. If this were done, our circulating medium would be increased, and credit expanded, with a result that credit could not be so easily controlled by the international bankers.

The remonetization of silver is anathema to the international banker and his American affiliates in Wall Street. If we remonetize silver, our country could move forward, free from the dominance of the Bank of England and the international group in Wall Street. Unfortunately for us as Americans, British influence, political, financial, and commercial—has kept our Nation from advancing economically as our wealth, energy, and national acumen would warrant. For this same reason, British influence, through propaganda, inveigled us into the World War.

Gold devaluation and complete rehabilitation of silver will free us from the control of the international bankers and the privately owned Federal Reserve System, neither of which rightfully has any place in this progressive age of the new deal. The American people are thinking as never before. Having the fullest confidence and the highest regard for a thorough Americanism and being fully conscious of the activity of American youth who are suffering more than any other, due to the thralldom in which they are placed by the international bankers, I anticipate that the next Congress will be composed of men younger in public service and endowed with a more sympathetic interest and understanding of the problems of the people. I predict that as a result of the infiltration of new blood in the Congress, we will reach that long-looked-for day of financial freedom, a freedom predicated upon the part ownership or control of the banking industry of America by our own Government, with the extension of credit to the farmer and worker by the Government upon the same liberal terms which the Government today offers the corrupt banking hierarchy of Wall Street and its affiliates.

Not only should control of our finances be taken from the small group of Wall Street financiers, but under the new deal we should initiate legislation which will more equitably distribute the profits received from labor in order that the farmer and wage earner may have not merely a living but a saving wage as a safeguard to themselves and families. Instead of taxing creative wealth by a consumption or sales tax, we should tax unearned and entrenched wealth by a larger tax on inheritances, estates, and gifts. Taxes on incomes in the higher brackets should also be increased. The new deal in order to be effective must abolish all tax-exempt securities, and thus force unearned wealth to pay its fair share of taxation. If we will tax those most able to pay we will then be in a position to provide old-age pensions and unemployment insurance, and thus by a more equitable distribution of the profits derived by the farmer and laborer in the production of wealth, and by granting to them proper protection under the law free our worthy citizens from the stigma of charity.

This tariff measure is a major forward move, and I gladly support it, but I am not oblivious of the greater benefit which will come to our people, provided we will remain free from the influence of paid propaganda of certain newspapers and radio speeches and think for ourselves when we cast our ballots in the approaching elections. Our ultimate solution is of our own making. Will we continue to flounder along, permitting the virus of the bankers to beguile the voters and contaminate the Congress, or will we demand in the new deal that there be shuffled out and discarded both the Republicans and Democrats in the Congress who by their past votes have indicated that they are more interested in maintaining the monopolistic financial hierarchy than they are in bringing economic freedom and recovery to our people?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am personally concerned, the approach of the conclusion of the debate on this important piece of tariff legislation comes with a great deal of pleasure to me. I know of nothing that offers as bright a rift in the dark clouds of the depression as does this bill.

We have passed much legislation in the brief time that I have been a Member of this body that has as its purpose in the aggregate relief from the depression. However, much of this legislation has been of a transitory nature. Its purpose was to relieve it is true, and relief it has given in a large measure, but most of it has been in the nature of relief to particular instrumentalities of endeavor, as well as being of a temporary nature. It has in many instances been as surface treatment of particular eruptions, as salve or ointments applied to a cancerous growth. But in this particular piece of legislation we have something that is fundamental, that goes to the very bedrock of the economic morass; it goes to the root of the cancer itself. If this legislation is passed by the Congress, as I have every reason to believe that it will be, we will see relief of a permanent nature, a market for our crops, and an outlet for our manufactured products.

I am sure that it is not necessary for me to point out to you that it has been the custom of the nations of the world for the past decade to continue the fallacious policy of building their tariff walls higher and higher. This largely originated in this country when another political party and another school of thought were in the ascendancy, the political party which has as its policy the theory of government that government is for the purpose of enriching the few at the expense of the many. It originated with the enactment of the iniquitous Fordney-McCumber Tariff law. It was subsequently aggravated by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff law. Its purpose was to enrich the manufacturers of this country at the expense of the masses of American people. The result was inevitable. The other nations of the world with whom we formerly traded, naturally in self-defense, one after the other adopted a policy of retaliation. As a result of this short-sighted policy of selfishness in the minds of the big manufacturing interest of this country and enacted into law through the domination of a Republican Congress, our tariff walls were built so high that it was impossible for the nations of the world who imported our products to in turn export their products into this country. In retaliation they have been continually building their tariff walls higher and higher against the exports from this country until today, Mr. Chairman, we have the unfortunate spectacle of the principal trading nations of the world having built veritable Chinese walls about themselves, this Nation having been the aggressor.

The foreign nations have said in substance to us that if we cannot ship our exports into your country then you cannot ship yours into ours. This is but another way of the child saying to its neighbor child, "If I can't play in your back yard, then you can't play in mine."

The inevitable consequence of this selfish, short-sighted policy is reflected in the exports and the imports of this country. It has further resulted in the factories which the Government sought under this regime to assist becoming idle. It has resulted in distress and unemployment among our laboring people. Moreover, it has resulted in the surplus products of our farms, which we formerly shipped to the other countries of the world, having no market and our farms being foreclosed under the mortgage hammer. Millions of our people who formerly labored in the factories of our industrial centers have been pounding the sidewalks of our cities seeking an opportunity to earn an honest livelihood, while millions of our farmers and farm hands have been forced to walk down the dusty highways of our rural sections, unemployed and in many instances the recipients, through necessity, of a dole system which is sapping the vitality of the Nation. Our ships which once sailed the high seas are tied up in the harbors of this country growing barnacles and sea weeds upon their hulls, while the sailors who sailed them through the lanes of the sea have been added to the lists of unemployed.

The difference between prosperity on the one hand and depression on the other in America is a market for the surplus products, both agricultural and manufactured, on the one hand and the absence thereof on the other. America has always been a nation which produced a surplus. A market for that surplus is essential to the welfare and prosperity of its people. Until we can restore this world market, we will have the necessity with us for such expediences as plowing up cotton, wheat, and corn or limiting their production. It is my sincere opinion that if the President is given the broad powers provided for in this bill to make reciprocal trade agreements, there will be no longer a necessity for such drastic expediences as acreage reduction, doles, and other forms of Federal financial assistance to our people.

Prior to the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber and Smoot-Hawley Tariff laws and the subsequent retaliatory barriers erected by the other nations of the world, this country enjoyed a marked degree of prosperity. I do not have the figures available farther back than 1929, but these show that the export trade of certain important countries of the world has declined alarmingly since that time under the short-sighted retaliatory tariff policy of those countries. In 1929 the export trade of this country was $5,157,083,000. In 1932 the export trade of this country had declined to a new low of $1,576,821,000. This has been the experience of certain other important countries of the world, as is reflected by the following tabulation of statistics, furnished me by the United States Tariff Commission.

In this connection, if I may, I should like to call the attention of the Congress to the fact that under this policy of tariff legislation many of our larger manufacturers, in order to escape the penalties provided by the other countries in the way of import duties in retaliation against this country for the Chinese walls that it had built about itself in its tariff policy, have erected factories in many of the foreign countries. They found that by doing this they could market and manufacture products profitably to themselves. But what has been the effect on this country? An analysis of this shows that millions of dollars of American capital, accumulated in America and which should be employed in America in order to give work to unemployed Americans, is being utilized in foreign countries to employ foreign labor at the expense of the American citizenship. This has been notably true in the case of the automobile industry. We find that many of our leading automobile manufacturers of popular-priced cars are today manufacturing their automobiles and tractors with American capital and foreign labor on foreign soil. America is the loser.

But the argument is made—and chiefly on the other side of this Chamber by those who were responsible for this condition—that this legislation gives to the President too much power. This argument is fallacious and unworthy of consideration. It is animated by two factors: First, it is political; and, second, the gentlemen over there (Republican side), as we unfortunately too well know, belong to that school of thought which believe in a protective-tariff policy for the enrichment of the moneyed interest of this country at the expense of the masses of the people of the country. May I not say to my Republican brethren, in all sincerity and candor, that they must realize that had it not been for the fact that an all-wise Providence saw to it that this great President of ours, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, was elected to the Presidency of the United States at the time when there were clouds of unrest, unemployment, chaos, and a condition bordering on a revolution, this country could not have gone on for another 6 months as it was going; and may I not say further along this line that you had just as well come along with him in his program of the new deal, however foreign it may be to your tastes and however contrary it may be to your wishes. For you must realize that if he does not succeed in his program of the new deal there is not going to be a Republican to succeed him. The people of this country have awakened from their lethargy and they are for the new deal. They have tried the party represented by the gentlemen to my left; and of one thing you may be assured, and that is that they are not going to place you in power again, at least at any time soon.

Of course, we realize that there are many Members of Congress who are opposed to giving the President this power to lower and raise the tariff within a 50-percent degree as he would have the power to do under the provisions of this legislation. There are too many selfish and conflicting interests for it to be otherwise. Picture what would happen if we were to undertake here in Congress to fix, either by lowering or raising, the tariff on the thousands of commodities affected. This Congress, should it undertake to do so, would be wrangling here for the next 6 months on this tariff bill alone, and at the end of that time we would have gotten no place. This bill provides for an all comprehensive, equitable, and just scheme for the control of this vexatious problem. It gives to the President the power to promote and expand foreign trade for the products of the United States as a means of assisting in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment, and in increasing the purchasing power of the American public in the present emergency as well as an opportunity to establish and maintain a better relationship among the various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce. It also offers a wonderful opportunity in a strife-ridden world for a better international understanding and more amicable relations between the nations of the world.

In 1921 the immortal Woodrow Wilson, whose body rests a few blocks from here in a crypt in Bethlehem Chapel, in speaking on this tariff question, gave expression, as the great Democratic leader that he was, to the everlasting truth of the thought which animates my mind today. It was true then; it is truer now. He said:

Clearly, this is no time for the erection of high trade barriers. It would strike a blow at the successful efforts which have been made by many of our great industries to place themselves on an export basis. It would stand in the way of the normal readjustment of business conditions throughout the world, which is as vital to the welfare of this country as to that of other nations.

Mrs. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as we have listened here to the highly technical discussion of tariff rates and figures in this debate, it has occurred to me that the situation we are facing might perhaps be more sharply presented by specific cases of particular industries.

For that purpose I am citing the shoe industry, which is of great value and importance to the people whom I represent.

There is in my district a plant that was transformed by one man from a struggling, indifferent enterprise located in a small country town, with a single factory that gave employment to but 200 people and produced but a thousand pairs of boots per day, into three thriving, prosperous manufacturing cities—all within a radius of a few miles—having an aggregate population of 30,000 and 22 factories, with a combined production averaging over 130,000 pairs of shoes per day. There are 17,000 workers, each with a personal interest in the enterprise, because after a dividend has been paid on the preferred and the common stock the balance of the profits is equally divided between the workers and the owners of the common stock. In addition, many of the workers are stockholders in the company. There has never been a strike, production is maintained, and, in 1925, the workers gathered dividends amounting to to nearly $1,200,000, or practically 5 percent on the $21,000,000 paid in actual wages in 1 year. The employer watches over and protects the interests of every employee. Food is assembled in public markets promoted by a community organization. The workers' city provides three hospitals, with complete medical service without charge to the employees and their families. Pensions are allowed for the old, and sick-relief and death benefits are provided for. The community supports a large park and playground, swimming pools, and everything to make life attractive to the workers and promote the feeling of shareholders in this great common enterprise.

The homes which are mostly owned by the employees are built and sold at cost and sometimes less.

Just 3 or 4 years ago, for the first time in the history of the shoe industry, the competition of cheap labor abroad and the introduction of American shoe machinery and American methods into foreign countries threatened this city as well as the industry, so the workers and owners of these manufacturing concerns came before Congress urging that the shoe industry, in common with other American industries, should have protection from cheap labor and unfair competition and so do its part toward the restoration of prosperity.

There are many unique features in this particular enterprise, because its founder is unique; yet I know from personal observation that in a general way it fairly reflects the life, the problems, the standards, and the people of dozens of shoe-manufacturing communities in the districts represented by nearly 100 of the Members of this House.

In the manufacture of shoes alone, Mr. Speaker, 17 of our States are vitally concerned, and by actual count there are 72 of our congressional districts where shoemaking is one of the leading industries. What I am going to say this afternoon touches the lives and the welfare of many millions of persons outside of my own district.

The people of our factory city, like the people of the other shoe-manufacturing communities of the country, Mr. Speaker, are fairly representative of the American standard of living. When I speak of the American standard, I mean bathtubs as well as radio sets, comfortable and hygienic houses, as well as automobiles, well-dressed, well-educated children, as well as fur coats, and money to put on the collection plate on Sunday, as well as money to spend on vacation in the summer.

In short, I am talking about a typical American cross-section of modest, reasonable, but comfortable living, which includes some things which were regarded as luxuries a few years ago. Now, note, if you please, they still are regarded as luxuries in many parts of the world but are taken as a matter of course in the American standard of living.

Some of those things, ladies and gentlemen of the House, strike the line of demarcation between the living standards of the American workman and the living standards of workmen and their families in other parts of the world.

Realization of that fact is fundamental in this entire tariff question which Congress is now facing in an entirely new aspect.

The American workman lives as he lives because of the prosperity attendant upon the industry in which he is engaged. Just as long as the industry continues in normal prosperity, just so long will he be able to enjoy the same sort of substantial, sensible living that his neighbors in other lines of industry enjoy.

I am not one of those who believe that Congress can or should attempt to legislate prosperity. I think that is the wrong way of looking at the whole problem. I urge that it is not the function of Congress and it is not the intent of government to lift any group bodily from a particular economic condition through artificial means. That is not the American idea. History suggests that it is a trick of the legislative bodies of decadent peoples.

But I think we are all agreed, Mr. Speaker, to this general proposition: That it is the function of the Congress to insure equal opportunity. That is all we are discussing when we talk about the threat which is now menacing the American shoe business generally.

The shoe industry is unique among American industries in its relation to the tariff schedules of this country. It has not enjoyed until recently the tariff protection accorded to most of the other manufacturing industries of the United States on the bulk of its output. Now and again, as tariff schedules have been revised, there have been suggestions for a protective duty on the all-leather boots and shoes which have had no protection, and the superiority of American shoemaking machinery has been such that no real economic necessity was then found to exist by the tariff makers for a protective schedule on boots and shoes. The placing of such a tariff came later.

One result of economic conditions has been to stimulate the master shoemakers of this country to a high plane of mass production, so that they have improved their machinery both in efficiency and in total output. They have made, and are making, more shoes and better shoes than may be found anywhere else in the world.

American brains and American hands made that possible. Sallying forth into the world arena with no protective tariff shield to aid them, they fought a good fight and they held their own. As long as their mechanical weapons of production were superior they could do that and still pay American wages in competition with the cheap-labor-made shoes of other countries. If it had been merely a case of competing on a base of labor costs alone, Mr. Speaker, the American shoe industry would have found protection necessary long before it did, because there is a vast difference between the wages paid the American shoemaker and the wages paid the foreign shoemaker. The average wage in the city I am citing as an example is $1,500 a year, and I understand the average wage of the foreign shoemaker is about $300 to $500 a year—from one fifth to one third of the reasonable American scale.

But there was a compensating factor, and that factor was the American invented and produced shoemaking machinery of which I have spoken. Its mass production, its high state of perfection gave the American manufacturer an advantage in production costs which enabled him to compete with the foreign shoe manufacturer and still pay American labor a living wage.

So things went along very well until the foreign shoe manufacturer, as was inevitable, began to buy and use American machines for shoe manufacture, and then it was a different story. The land was flooded with shiploads of cheap shoes from Czechoslovakia, which, with a great ballyhoo of advertising, were scattered throughout the stores of the land. I myself—I blush to state—succumbed to the bargain lure and bought two pairs of so-called "Deauville" sandals for $2.95. They looked as good as any shoe, but after one tramp through the dew-laden grass of my country home they became so shrunken and distorted as to be no longer wearable—not much of a bargain.

This shoe industry located in my district, which I have described, approximates the American ideal of a localized manufacturing plant. It, indeed, approximates the President's own ideal of a manufacturing community. Also its present operation assures all the objectives of the N.R.A. And yet it is almost certainly one of those industries which would be subject to destruction under this new definition of an inefficient industry. If plants of this sort are to be destroyed in order that we may all be forced to wear the cheap and shoddy shoes produced for a pittance in foreign factories—whose cheapness is to be proof of their efficiency—then it follows, of course, that all the less ideal plants will already have been destroyed, and hundreds of the employer class will no longer be able to employ anybody. Then, when the employer class is destroyed, what is there left but for the Government to furnish everyone with a living? May I ask, Where is the money to come from when there is no longer prosperous industry in this country to be taxed?

Is this not a perfect illustration of the well-known "vicious circle", the process sometimes described as "killing the goose that lays the golden eggs"?

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the reciprocal tariff bill to give the President authority to raise or lower tariff rates for the following reasons:

First, the platform of the National Republican Party for 1928 promised to revise the tariff rates so as to place agriculture on a parity with industry. Those promises have never been fulfilled. In 1930, under Republican control, the Congress passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. That bill, because of the high rates fixed on manufacturer and industrial commodities, increased the disparity between agriculture and industry. I voted against the Hawley-Smoot bill for that reason.

Republican opponents of this bill say the President will reduce some of these high tariff rates. I hope they are right. That is another reason I am for this bill; to reduce some of the extortionate rates on iron, steel, aluminum, and textiles named in the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. The farmers and common people of my district know that they are being made to pay these high tariffs every time they buy a plow, a wagon, or a machine of any kind. Our wives and mothers know they are being made to pay a tariff in the high prices they pay every time they buy a dress or a dish pan.

We people from the Middle West are being made the goats under the present tariff system. Eastern manufacturers and industrialists are collecting their tariff tribute or subsidy direct from us because they can control their production and fix the price free from competition. It is true the Hawley-Smoot bill provides protection on our agricultural products, but we produce more of these than we can consume and hence we must sell them in competition with the world market and even then the American farmer can realize little benefit from the tariff because they can neither control their production or fix their sale price.

I am a firm believer in the principles of a protective tariff to cover the difference in labor at home and abroad, but further than that I refuse to yield. I am unalterably opposed to the license granted by the Hawley-Smoot bill to exact a tribute from the consumers of the country and to swell the profits of industrial monopolies. Such license is contrary to the very essence of free government. I am opposed to the present tariff law because it raises the cost of living, because it puts the farmers further in the hole, because it seriously injures our foreign trade.

So, Mr. Speaker, the bill offers the only chance Members of this House will have in this Congress to vote for a possible 50-percent reduction of the Hawley-Smoot tariff rates.

I am for this bill because I believe that President Roosevelt will reduce some of these high rates and thereby reduce the cost of living. The Wisconsin farmer and working man cannot continue to pay high prices for the necessities of life on present prices of farm products and low wages.

I have another reason for supporting this bill. The Republican candidate for President in 1928, Mr. Hoover, promised the people of the Northwest the St. Lawrence waterway. That is another unfulfilled promise. The St. Lawrence Treaty was submitted to the United States Senate this year by President Roosevelt. It was defeated but everyone will concede that President Roosevelt did everything in his power to secure the adoption of the treaty. Passage of this bill gives the President power to reduce by 50 percent the extortionate tariff rates put on nearly everything the American farmer has to buy to eat, to wear, to live, and to operate the farm as fixed by the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act.

I voted for this bill because I believe the President has the wisdom and political backbone to put agriculture on a parity with industry by reducing the high protection afforded industry which is being paid by the American farmers and consumers. There is only one way to put agriculture on a parity with industry and that is by reducing the tariff on the industries that produce what the farmer has to buy. Hoover promised to do this in 1928, but he got cold feet. Under the terms of this bill Roosevelt can, as he did with the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, redeem another 1928 Republican platform pledge to the folks of Wisconsin. I believe he will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the tariff question is as old as our Government. The debates on the present bill have been illuminating and exhaustive. The report submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means abundantly justifies the enactment of this bill.

The bill as introduced contained but two sections. The purpose of the bill, to expand our foreign markets, is clearly set forth in the first section.

For the purpose of expanding our foreign trade the President, under the terms of the bill, is authorized from time to time—

- (1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and
- (2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions * * * as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreements that the President has entered into hereunder.

The bill provides that no increase or decrease of the tariff shall be greater than 50 percent of the present rate of duty, nor shall any article be transferred from the free to the dutiable list.

The President is given broad powers to suspend the application to articles grown, produced, or manufactured by any country, because of its discriminatory treatment of American commerce.

The life of the bill has been limited to 3 years, by amendment.

The exhaustive discussion of the bill has been largely directed to two points:

First, the constitutionality of the bill has been assailed.

The report of the committee deals exhaustively with the question of the constitutionality of the bill and the history of similar tariff legislation delegating such powers to the President.

Similar power was conferred by the act of Congress of June 4, 1794, in which the President was authorized and empowered—

Whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States * * *

In the act of June 13, 1798, to suspend commercial intercourse between the United States and France, it was provided:

Then and thereupon it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, being well ascertained of the premises, to remit and discontinue the prohibitions and restraints hereby enacted and declared; and he shall be, and is hereby, authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly.

This authority granted by the act of June 13, 1798, was very similar to the authority conferred upon the President in the present bill.

As the report of the committee indicates, similar authority was conferred over commerce to the President by various other acts of Congress. Many of them are cited in the report of the committee.

By the act of March 3, 1815, it was provided:

Whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished.

In the Tariff Act of 1890 it was provided:

Whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the Government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which, in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act.

This power is almost identical to that conferred upon the President in the present bill.

Mr. Justice Harlan, in the case of Field v. Clark (1892; 143 U.S. 649, 681), speaking for the Court, said:

The Court is of opinion that the third section of the act of October 1, 1890, is not liable to the objection that it transfers legislative and treaty-making power to the President.

The Tariff Act of 1897 conferred similar authority upon the President and authorized and empowered him to suspend during the time of such agreement or concession, by proclamation to that effect, the imposition and collection of the duties mentioned in that act.

Similar authority was contained in the Tariff Act of 1909 and the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922.

The constitutionality of these delegations of power was challenged, but was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Hampton & Co. v. The United States (1928; 276 U.S. 394), wherein the Chief Justice, speaking for the Court, said:

The same principle that permits Congress to exercise its rate-making power in interstate commerce, by declaring the rule which shall prevail in the legislative fixing of rates, and enables it to remit to a rate-making body created in accordance with its provisions the fixing of such rates, justifies a similar provision for the fixing of customs duties on imported merchandise.

The history of tariff legislation and the fact that similar powers were delegated to the President as early as 1794, soon after the Constitution was adopted, and while many members of the Constitutional Convention were alive and some of them were serving in Congress, and the uniform holding of the courts in the interpretation of similar powers delegated in a large number of acts of Congress, justifies our assuming that this act is constitutional and is not an unreasonable delegation of power to the President.

The second question involved is what is sought to be accomplished through reciprocal trade agreements authorized by the act.

Everyone knows that our foreign trade has fallen off for the past few years and has reached a point where it is almost negligible. We must have a foreign market for our surplus agricultural and manufactured products. The effect of the loss of our foreign trade has been particularly disastrous to the agricultural sections of the country. The 1933 cotton crop sold for as low as 5 cents per pound at the end of the marketing season, and everyone knows that this price was ruinously below the cost of production.

We regularly export about 60 percent of our cotton. When our foreign market is lost the cotton produced is sold upon our domestic market, and the result is an extremely low price for the South's staple product, which is cotton.

For the year 1933 we produced 13,177,000 bales of cotton. It is estimated that our carry-over cotton was approximately 11,500,000 bales.

For the year 1933 we produced 527,413,000 bushels of wheat. We export on an average of 10 percent of our wheat. In the event we cannot find a foreign market for our surplus wheat it is dumped on our domestic market, which results in a ruinously low price for wheat to the farmers.

For the year 1933 we produced 2,330,237,000 bushels of corn, and exported 5,364,649 bushels. Most of our corn is fed to livestock.

Everyone knows that our imports as to cotton, wheat and corn are negligible. We import a little long-staple cotton from Egypt, which is used in thread and automobile manufacturing, and a little corn from the Argentine, used in the manufacture of breakfast foods, and we import no wheat of any consequence except a little from Canada, which is shipped in, in bond, milled, and then shipped out.

Anyone familiar with the facts, and who makes a reckless statement that a tariff on our imports of wheat, cotton, and corn, or any other agricultural product, of which we regularly raise a surplus, is beneficial, should be "bored for the hollow horn." It is an irresponsible statement, one that is not justified, and one that cannot be defended.

However, the entering into of trade agreements in order to expand our foreign markets for our agricultural and manufactured products, is beneficial, it is extremely important to the people of this country, and there is no other piece of legislation which is so essential to recovery, particularly to the farmers of the country, than legislation such as this, which has for its purpose the regaining of our foreign trade.

This bill is temporary legislation as the following amendment clearly shows and is to meet an emergency: "The provisions of this act shall terminate 3 years from the date of its enactment." It gives the President broad powers in this emergency. We hope to see many new agreements entered into immediately.

Instead of cotton selling for 5 cents per pound, as was the case at the close of the marketing season of 1932, our hope is that it will sell around 20 cents per pound, which would enable the producers to pay their taxes, meet their other obligations, and live on the farm with some degree of comfort.

Instead of wheat selling at 25 cents per bushel, as in the summer of 1932, we hope, with an expanding market for wheat, that it will sell around $1.50 per bushel and enable the wheat farmers of the country to meet their indebtedness.

With general prosperity returned, and with an active foreign market restored, we look forward to seeing our livestock, in the form of meats, in every foreign market of the world, thus insuring a better price for both livestock and corn. The advantages of this bill can hardly be overestimated.

Everyone appreciates that we cannot live commercially to ourselves alone. We hope to see trade agreements entered into with foreign countries and our foreign trade restored.

In order to avoid any doubt upon the subject of foreign debts there was added an amendment to the bill which provides:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to give any authority to cancel or reduce in any manner any of the debts of any foreign country to the United States.

I heartily favored this amendment, as I have never voted for the reduction of any of these foreign debts.

After we entered the World War we paid all of our own indebtedness, and I do not favor the reduction by one penny of the indebtedness of any foreign country.

I am appending hereto for the information of the public a statement relative to the indebtedness of the foreign governments to the United States prepared by the Treasury Department showing balance due as of January 4, 1934:

Compare the indebtedness shown by the above table with the table inserted below and it will be found that the indebt-ness has been increased instead of decreased. I feel sure that every patriotic citizen of this Nation, when he realizes that our Nation paid its expenses in full during the World War, will agree that all foreign nations should pay in full for our advancements to each.

On December 12, 1929, I made a speech in the House against the French debt settlement, which canceled $4,627,225,895.83 of France's indebtedness to our country. When the Italian debt settlement was up for consideration I also vigorously opposed it. I urged, on all occasions, when these bills came up for consideration that the amounts remitted or canceled were transferred to the taxpayers of our own country. That was literally true.

For the information of the people of the country I am again inserting an official table, prepared by the Treasury Department as of date when the settlements were made, showing (1) the countries with which settlements have been made, (2) the date of agreement, (3) the amount of debt funded, (4) interest to be received, (5) total amount to be received, (6) the amount that would have been received on a British basis (3-3½ percent interest), (7) total amount that would have been received on a 4¼-percent interest basis, (8) total amount canceled on a 4¼-percent interest basis, and (9) total aggregate amount, being $10,705,618,006.90, canceled, lost, or remitted in all of the settlements.

1 Settlement made on British basis.

This table is official. The figures prepared by the Treasury Department cannot be disputed. We lose, cancel, forgive, or remit on the settlements with the 13 countries, based on 4¼-percent interest, the amount we pay on our Liberty bonds, the proceeds from which we loan these Governments, $10,705,618,006.90.

On the basis of the British settlement, 3 percent for the first 10 years and 3½-percent interest thereafter, we cancel or lose $5,675,474,006.10.

This is a gift through the remission of interest of nearly a million dollars per day to 12 European countries.

The difference between 4¼-percent interest our Government pays on our Liberty bonds and the interest received by us in these settlements represents a loss to the American taxpayers of $332,261,750 for 1929.

I am sure the people generally are not advised as to what Congress has done in these debt settlements, nor do they know that these settlements agreed upon aid the large financial interests to negotiate large loans with generous discounts.

I do not believe the people of my State, for example, would approve this settlement or the Italian debt settlement. Italy pays no interest this year, but in 5 years from the date of the settlement will begin to pay at the rate of one eighth of 1 percent. We are paying Liberty bondholders on this debt in 1929 $85,935,000 and receive no interest—not a penny—in return. The interest on the Italian debt is increased during 5 yearly periods at the rate of one eighth of 1 percent per period, until, during the last 7 years, the maximum interest received is only 2 percent.

Surely this is a large burden for the taxpayers to bear to appease the greed of the bankers who are making loans at high rates and upon large commissions. The people, when they know the truth, will withhold their approval of these settlements.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I want to express my views in connection with the bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930, and in connection therewith I want to touch upon the absolute necessity for reciprocal trade agreements as a means toward recovery.

I have heard so much in these debates about destruction of inefficient industries, and invariably the inference is drawn that the President of the United States intends that certain industries shall be sacrificed, even though it were possible to save them.

Every Member of the House of Representatives, I presume, has received correspondence from the American Manufacturers Export Association, urging the support of the Membership for the President's request for authority to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements under the provisions embodied in this bill. A specific resolution urging such powers was passed in May of 1933. A pamphlet expressing the policy of this association of exporters was appended with each communication. There is not an individual in Congress who is not impressed with the significance of this expression when we take into account the industrial giants whose names appear on the official letterhead. I should like to include as part of the Record the names which appear thereon.

These men, among others, represent that great group of manufacturers of automobiles, an industry which is leading the Nation back to prosperity, and this industry was made to suffer more than any other by the iniquitous provisions of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill which was forced through the Congress, labeled as the "Grundy bill."

I want to call to the attention of the Members that in spite of the assurances of President Hoover, when he campaigned for the Presidency in 1928, that there would be no tampering with the tariff excepting possibly a downward revision, as a matter of fact, hundreds of items were boosted so high on the tariff scale as to cause international resentment and the erection of corresponding tariff barriers which paralyzed industry and disturbed the comity between nations. I remember distinctly what happened as a result of this short-sighted policy. American manufacturers, and automobile manufacturers in particular, found it necessary, because of the retaliatory tariff walls which were erected to exclude our American products, to build in self-defense automobile and other manufacturing plants in foreign countries all over the world. It is a significant fact that Canada at the time sent a special emissary here to Washington to plead with the administration for a sane and sensible tariff policy and against any measure which would further paralyze the trade between these two friendly nations, the United States and Canada. I remember that it was without success that he made this appeal. The rapacious interests in this country were determined to make the local market pay, and pay dearly. They cared not about the international market, without which there can be no prosperity, if they were permitted to exploit the American people. The Canadian market alone was worth approximately three quarters of a billion dollars per annum to the American public, while the Canadians sold to the United States approximately $500,000,000 worth of goods per year, with a net trade balance in favor of the United States of about $250,000,000 per annum. The antagonism which was aroused brought about an order in council which made it exceedingly difficult for the American manufacturer to compete in a Canadian market. In fact, it made it impossible for him to sell in Canada at a profit without the production of American goods within Canadian territory. As a consequence, American manufacturers, following the adoption of the Grundy tariff, built branch plants north of the American boundary at the rate of 2 factory buildings every week, or more than 100 factory branches a year. This not only gave great impetus to the construction business of Canada but also meant an increase in the employment of Canadians, with a corresponding decrease in the employment of our own workers in the United States.

Has it never occurred to the opposition, in its desire to block the President, that, far from having in mind the destruction of inefficient industries, he has in mind the revitalizing of industries that have been dead in this country and in other countries because of the paralyzing effect of a plundering, robber tariff? The President has in mind—and of that we may be sure—the bringing-about of a condition by reciprocal agreements that will bring back to commercial activity industries that have remained dormant for quite some time past. The short-sighted policy of the previous administration, as regards the tariff, has caused irreparable harm and is responsible for the frightful condition that laid low the shipping industry of this country. We need not show any unusual signs of brilliancy to understand that it is impossible for American merchantmen to depart from our shores loaded to the gunwhales with cargoes destined for foreign countries and not expect them to return in ballast.

President Roosevelt has shown himself to be keenly interested in the question of reviving international trade, and in this movement he has the support of America's foremost manufacturers, producing every conceivable kind of manufactured products. It is clearly apparent that we cannot bring about a reduction of international tariffs without negotiation. It is said that American negotiators will be quite capable of maintaining their position. In fact, I believe they will have an advantage when discussing reciprocal trade treaties. I am in favor of this bill because I realize that the tariff excesses of recent memory have been so great as to cause the stasis which we know in this country and throughout the world as the depression. There are very few in this House, I daresay, who believe in the theory of free trade under present circumstances. The provisions of this bill will amply protect American industry, will definitely bar goods produced under conditions that are intolerable and disapproved of in this country, and, while we concede somewhat cheaper labor in foreign countries, we at the same time must admit that our production methods are far superior to theirs. This wipes out any advantage which they may have. This may not be true in every instance, but American ingenuity has shown itself capable of competition against any and all foreign producers except when a product is produced under conditions of slavery or imprisonment. Any free labor, even though paid less than the American worker, cannot produce efficiently enough to overcome our advantage.

One of the most potent arguments that can be advanced in behalf of this bill at the present time is the declaration of the automobile industry some time ago when it declared for a 10-percent horizontal reduction of all tariffs as a stimulus to world trade. The automobile manufacturers export approximately 0.1 of their products and depend upon the local market for the sale of the other 90 percent. I dislike to quote statistical figures—in fact, I have refrained from doing so in most of my discourses. I submit that the latent possibilities of trade revival are very great in this instance, and I contend that the most direct and effective method is that of friendly conversation between nations with an object of reciprocal action between them. There are industries in America and there are industries in foreign countries that are dormant and have been so as a result of the paralyzing effect of international tariff barriers. This unfortunate condition can be remedied by giving the President the necessary power to negotiate trade agreements that will be mutually advantageous. I am sorry to hear Members of the House, who are apprehensive lest they suffer from temporary disadvantages, referring to this bill as though it were the deathknell to America's industrial life. The President has for his purpose the uplift and the revitalizing of industry which has been mired for the past 4 or 5 years.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I must differ with those who have indicated their opposition to this proposal authorizing the President of the United States to enter into reciprocal trade agreements. They seem to have lost sight of the real terms and purpose of the measure. Even before the Committee on Ways and Means offered an amendment limiting the duration of this legislation, I have recognized it as an emergency measure.

On every hand it is apparent we cannot follow our present policy and meet the competition of other nations in the effort all are making to find an outlet for their commodities. We must insure a competent method for successfully combating this competition. Millions of our people are out of employment, billions of dollars' worth of machinery and equipment are standing idle, our foreign trade has been decreasing in alarming proportions, the result of which our merchant marine faces greater difficulties than at any time in its history. The enactment of this bill will place a weapon in the hands of the Executive with which outlets can be found for our commodities to a degree that will largely overcome many of these difficulties. It will give the President an opportunity to bargain with other nations in a manner that can be wholly beneficial to our people.

Other Members of this body have ably presented the constitutional questions, if any, that are involved; they have laid stress on the advantages to be gained by a foreign market for our agricultural and manufactured products, and I do not desire to reiterate these facts. I desire simply to call attention to a matter directly connected with this proposal, an industry of vital importance to this Nation which this measure, when adopted and carried into effect, will prove of great assistance in rehabilitating.

The American merchant marine is an auxiliary navy. It is to our Navy what railroads and good transportation facilities are to the Army. It is the means of securing supplies, of transporting necessities. Our merchant marine ranks with our fighting ships in importance of defense, for without an adequate merchant marine we cannot hope to successfully supply our Navy with its requirements in time of war. It is the Navy's very lifeblood. Any policy dealing with foreign trade which does not take these facts into account is short-sighted.

We must increase our international trade to build up our merchant marine unless the Federal Government is to openly subsidize the merchant marine in far greater amounts than are now paid under ocean-mail contracts. Isolation, either deliberately planned or forced upon us by slow and backward methods of tariff revision, means the death of our merchant marine. No one denies that, if necessary, the United States can be self-contained. But in the normal course of affairs the United States must find an outlet for between 10 percent and 12 percent of all its products. Isolation closes the ports of foreign nations to this surplus. This cannot be.

The falling-off in our foreign trade during recent years has been a major contributing cause to the depression. The district I represent is located in a seaport city, San Francisco. San Francisco has one of the greatest natural harbors in the world and is a principal outlet for our overseas export trade with the Orient. In 1929 the total foreign trade of the Port of San Francisco amounted to $418,696,000. In 1933 this traffic had decreased to only $140,026,241. The value of the exports from the United States passing through San Francisco in 1929 was $206,018,000. By 1933 these exports had fallen to $84,511,952. These are exact figures from the United States Department of Commerce reports, and they speak eloquently for the enactment of this legislation.

This bill cannot be successfully construed as giving the President any tariff-making authority he does not already possess under the terms of the Tariff Act of 1930. It simply changes the basis for his authority in such a way that he can use it to greater advantage for the people of this country. The Tariff Act of 1930 gives the President the authority to increase the tariff as much as 50 percent to protect American industry. This bill will give the President the authority to increase or decrease the tariff as much as 50 percent to protect and assist American industry in its efforts to find a foreign market for its products; to find jobs for workingmen; to find traffic for our merchant marine. It will give him this authority during a temporary period when every resource of the Nation is being used to restore normal conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not fear the misapplication of this authority. I cannot conceive of a President of these United States, vested in this power, doing that which the opponents of this measure predict will be done, and that is the drying-up of American industry. The problem of the Nation today, and the problem throughout the depression, has been to return men to useful occupations. Not millions but billions of dollars are being spent for that purpose. Can it be anticipated in any way that any President of the United States, invested with this authority, would deliberately dry up an industry in this country and turn more men and women into the streets to join the millions of unemployed? It is beyond my conception. The Presidency of the United States is the greatest trust any free people can bestow, and to anticipate its betrayal in such a manner as this is absurd.

The same may be said for the products of the farm. I do not represent a farming district. There is not a single farmer in my district. But I have given a sympathetic ear to his problems and have rubbed elbows with him, as I have with his brother in poverty, the American workingman. I know the difficulties he is facing, and I have supported every measure presented to this body since I have been a Member of Congress that would prove of assistance to him. The Government of the United States, upon the recommendation of the Executive, is paying untold millions to the farmers of this country for the curtailment of farm crops, including pigs, if you please; and how can it be logically anticipated in the same breath that the President would admit into this country the products of other nations that would create further competition with these products of the farm?

This legislation, as amended, limits the Executive to the promotion of foreign trade and expressly prohibits foreign debts owed to this country becoming involved in any trade agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe the enactment of this bill will go far toward lifting us out of the terrible depression; I believe it will aid the American workingman, the American farmer, American industry, and the American merchant marine. I shall therefore support it.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, when I became a candidate in the primary campaign of 1932, I published throughout my district a platform which contained as one of its main planks the advocacy of reciprocal tariff.

I have watched the creeping paralysis of the depression cast its pall over agriculture and industry under the baneful influence of the Smoot-Hawley-Grundy tariff. I represent the district extending along the Pacific coast for 200 miles immediately south of San Francisco. It has a variety of interests. The northern part of the district has been called the "bedroom of San Francisco." Eighty-five percent of the 85,000 people residing in San Mateo County are essentially part of the life of that great industrial and export center. In the great Santa Clara Valley we produce almost one third of the prunes of the world and a large part of the apricots grown in the United States. At Santa Cruz and Monterey we have one of the greatest fish-canning sectors. In the Pajaro Valley is located the great apple belt of California, while the Salinas Valley is one of the great farming and vegetable-growing areas of the United States. Many of the largest fruit and vegetable canneries of the world are located in these valleys.

All of these activities are largely dependent upon export trade. This export market has practically disappeared. As we erected our tariff barriers, we met the retaliatory responses in those countries which comprised our national market. Germany, one of the great outlets for our dried fruits, barred the doors in our face. France, the leading market for our sardines, established a practical embargo. So the story runs. Canada, our great, friendly neighbor, no longer accepted the products of our soil. Our fruit and our produce rotted in the fields. Nature responded bountifully to the labors of our people, but our accumulating surpluses drove our canners and our farmers into bankruptcy. The natural result was stagnation and fast-approaching ruin for all our people.

The people of my district are typically American. Their ancestry runs back through years of toil and devotion to those great strains of western Europe which have made us a people. They are honest, hard-working, God-fearing people. They have solved the problems of production. All that they ask is that the artificial barriers which have been erected against our people shall be broken down.

Foreign peoples have given their governments power to act and to secure their share of the markets of the world. The opportunity is now presented to us to enter into markets of the world and to compete, by permitting the President to break through the present impossible conditions and to introduce reciprocal relationship with the friendly powers of the world, in order that we may exchange with these people our surpluses for those goods of theirs which we cannot profitably and economically produce for ourselves.

I have been delighted and encouraged to know that the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the first representative commercial body in the United States to propose and to urge exactly the plan that the President is now asking Congress to adopt, is today standing firmly and vigorously in the same position.

They state today, as they stated 2 years ago, that our hopes for the development of Pacific trade and shipping in San Francisco harbor will not be developed under the present high-tariff policy. They say today, as they stated in a former resolution adopted by the San Francisco chamber on February 4, 1932, that the revival of our foreign trade depends on the liberalization of our commercial policy to our customer countries as well as our own, and they join with me in urging upon this body the establishment of machinery for reciprocal concessions in tariff rates in the interest of the revival and upbuilding of our foreign commerce.

I am willing to confer this power upon the President in order that he may have a fair opportunity to bargain upon an equal footing in behalf of our people and their interests.

I am looking forward with hope to the day when agriculture and industry can stand proudly upon their own feet, not begging for salvation from disaster, but finally forming the foundation for social and economical justice and prosperity to a forward-looking and progressive people.

I vote for this measure conferring reciprocal bargaining powers upon the President in the belief that it constitutes a real advance toward that goal.

CENTURY OF PROGRESS—WORLD'S FAIR, CHICAGO (H.DOC. NO. 293)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Commission to the end that legislation may be enacted extending the availability of funds previously appropriated for Government participation in A Century of Progress, the Chicago world's fair centennial celebration, in 1933, to June 30, 1935, and also authorizing the appropriation of funds in the amount of $405,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the reopening of A Century of Progress, the Chicago world's fair centennial celebration, in 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

TARIFF ACT OF 1935

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WEST of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, during the course of my remarks on the tariff bill I made reference to several statistical tables. I ask unanimous consent to include them in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AMERICAN LEGION DID NOT ENDORSE ECONOMY ACT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to insert a letter and statement from the former National Commander, Louis Johnson, in regard to veterans' matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, during the debates on the independent offices appropriation bill it was stated on the floor of the House that the national commander of the American Legion, the Honorable Louis Johnson, endorsed the passage of the so-called "Economy Act" which became law March 20, 1933. I have received a letter from Commander Johnson in which, referring to this matter, he stated:

I should like the record straightened out once and for all. I did not at any time, anywhere, under any circumstances approve the economy bill, and all statements to this effect are false; and after the passage of both the House and the Senate of the economy bill over the opposition of the American Legion I issued a statement which did not approve the economy bill but pointed out to the President of the United States that matters affecting the life and death of the veterans were by that act placed in his hands, and asked for the needed compassion and mercy in the regulations the President was authorized to issue thereunder.

This statement was predicated upon the belief (afterward expressed in practically every speech I made and from coast to coast) that even though we had never approved the economy act, had opposed its enactment and the veterans "had taken a licking in its passage", that we of the Legion were still American citizens and still supported our Government. For that statement, a copy of which is hereto attached, I have no apologies to make to anyone.

STATEMENT ISSUED BY COMMANDER JOHNSON MARCH 15, 1933

On the day following the new President's inaugural oath, I pledged the million men of the American Legion to give their utmost loyalty and help in the complex and difficult problem now facing the Chief Executive. I stated then in a Nation-wide broadcast, in which the President participated, that the American Legion wants nothing more than to be of service to America in this situation as our members were in 1917-18.

The time to render that service has arrived. Congress has given to the President the authority to put into effect the economies the President believes necessary to restore the financial stability of our country. This new legislation is fraught with gravest consequences to the disabled veteran. The President, under the authority given him, has powers of life and death over thousands of men who once gladly offered their lives in a period of national emergency.

The Legion has every faith in the discretion, fairness, and the justice with which the President will deal with this problem, involving, as it does in many instances, the need for compassion and mercy.

The President needs the support of every loyal American, and today I am calling upon the 10,709 Legion posts and our 1,000,000 members throughout our great organization to uphold the pledge that I have made as the National Commander of the American Legion. I am asking that special meetings be held by every Legion post where it will officially express by resolution such loyalty and utmost help. Many of our posts have already taken the initiative and set dates for such meetings.

In addition, I am tendering to the President of the United States the benefit of exhaustive studies the Legion has made through the years and the entire facilities of the Legion national rehabilitation committee that he may have direct contact with and the expert advice and experience of these American Legion officials who have devoted their lives to the rehabilitation of disabled veterans of the World War.

"There is no question of Legion loyalty. The patriotism of every member has been proved in his war service and in his peacetime devotion to the welfare of our country as evidenced by his membership in the Legion. In this hour of emergency we are but eager to serve the Stars and Stripes again under whatever orders our new Commander in Chief may give. Many disagree with the new law, but now in this crisis we must take his orders. We have never asked anything for ourselves but what we felt was just and what was first proposed by the American people through their Representatives in Congress. We have fought long and hard for the proper care of our disabled comrades and they will always remain our first and greatest obligation save only God and country.

"Our President is confronted with problems as great as ever faced the Chief Executive of the United States at the beginning of his administration. He has not faltered in action needed as he sees it. Like a brave soldier in battle, he is giving unstintingly of himself. Yet, with all his leadership and fine courage, he cannot win the war on the depression, and he cannot lead us back to the mountain top unless all citizens accord him their utmost help. The need for patriotism is as urgent today as it was in 1917-18. Our Nation needs a reawakened spirit of unity and confidence. Our citizens need a re-inspired willingness to follow the leadership of our newly elected Chief Executive. The American Legionnaire is that kind of a citizen, and it is the purpose of our organization to set an example for all to follow in giving to our President and Government our utmost faith and assistance whenever it is needed and whatever the necessary costs in sacrifice may be, including life itself.

"I call upon all Legionnaires to emulate the spirit of Washington and the Nation's fathers 'that we may go down in history honored and respected among the Nation's favored.'

"I again pledge the Legion to fulfill its preamble declaration of service to God and country and to keep on keeping on."

HOUSE RESTAURANT

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (Rept. No. 1102) to accompany House Resolution 236, for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 236

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate by what authority the Committee on Accounts controls and manages the conduct of the House restaurant, and by what authority said committee or any members thereof issued and enforced rules or instructions whereby any citizen of the United States is discriminated against on account of race, color, or creed in said House restaurant, grill room, or other public appurtenances or facilities connected therewith under the supervision of the House of Representatives.
